NEXT WAR WILL BE PERFECTION OF SCIENTIFIC BUTCHERY AND WANTON WASTE EXPERTS SEE

BY HENRY WOOD
(United Press Staff Correspondent.)

PARIS, Jan. 20. (By Mail.)—Thanks to the progress of science applied in the art of destruction, the next war will be a human butchery so great that not only the combatants but the unoffending civil population will be wiped out as well.

This is the unanimous opinion of six of the greatest and best qualified men in France to speak on the subject.

Three of them are members of the world famous French Academy of Sciences, and as a consequence, most qualified to speak from the respective standpoints of wireless telegraphy, chemistry and self-propelling projectiles, while the others are the highest possible experts in aviation, naval and land warfare.

These men, each of whom contributes his views of the next great war, one of the most successful French are Monsieur Edouard Branly, French

German army on the western front, and finally Commandant X, one of the highest authorities of the French navy, but whose name naval etiquette does not permit to be used.

Here is the first:

BY EDOUARD BRANLY
(French Inventor.)

"It is certain that every time someone discovers something new, the first idea is to apply it to war, and immediately people get busy to make machines improving the science that helps killing.

Explosions by Wireless.

"During the war we thought of blowing up German dumps by wireless. It could have been done, but owing to the lack of receptors fixed by ourselves inside the dumps there was no possibility of doing it. These receptors should have been placed in advance in caves dug underneath what we wanted to blow up.

"At sea, it is possible to throw in the middle of a fleet some kind of a ship built to be directed from a distant point to cause the explosion through wireless, of a bomb, or several bombs. Such a ship might cause serious damage. But, in the present state of wireless, we must say that these orders, to be carried out, cannot be instantaneous. This means other difficulties to solve, which are not insurmountable.

"There could also be submarines, airplanes, purposely sacrificed, carrying no passengers, and which managed by wireless would cause similar explosions.

"Anyhow, from the fact only that the progress of aviation and chemistry grows so rapidly, the future war would be a most destructive one, not exclusively for the combatants but the unoffending civil population as well.

"As soon as aviation existed, it was used to increase the horrors of war. The progress of chemistry has been employed to make the worst asphyxiating gas.

"The progress of aviation especially is formidable and disquieting. Since an airplane can carry through the air several tons of bombs, and running at great speed, I am inclined to think that it may be an urgent question to take up, in peace time, of digging underneath the ground of cities, deep underground abris, for, should war break out, there would be no more safety for anybody on any point of land.

Underground Cities.

"Thus, the first idea of those who
