Doris' Family

WISH I had a house and family and everything," said four-year old Doris as she looked out of the window and sighed a big doleful sigh. "Now what do you think you'd do with all that?" laughed Aunt Jane who was sitting near by with a basket of mending to absorb her attention. You see Aunt Jane hadn't been visiting in Doris's house very long or she would have known what Doris had always and always wanted to play that—that she would rather play house than anything else. No, Aunt Jane had just come a few days before and she had had a busy time getting acquainted with her little niece.

"Well," replied Doris thoughtfully, "I'd take care of 'em just like mother does. Mother's always busy taking care of her house and of me, and Jack and the baby and she doesn't have any time to play with me. Or leastways," corrected Doris as she recalled times when mother really had played with her, "she doesn't have enough time to play with me. And you see, Aunt Jane, if I had a family and a house, I wouldn't have time either and so everything would be all right."

"What's this about you wanting a family?" asked Doris's father who came into the room in time to hear the last of Doris's speech. "I think I know where you can get one."

"Me?" exclaimed Doris. "I truly family? For me?" She could hardly believe her ears had heard rightly.

"Yes," admitted her father, "for you, a whole family. I was just wondering what in the world we would do about a certain family I seem to have acquired but if you are looking for a family I can oblige you. Come out to the garage."

Doris was so excited she could hardly wait to put on the coat and cap her father insisted she wear.

"Yes, I know the garage is warm," he agreed laughingly, "but the rain out to the garage wasn't steam heated when I came in just now and I know the family will wait till you put wraps on so hurry up and get them Pussay." When her father lifted back an old rug she lost no time getting into her ited Riding Hood cape and together she and her father hurried out to the garage.

Doris hadn't the faintest notion what she might find out there and when her father lifted back an old rug she could hardly believe her eyes saw right. One, two, three or were there more? squirming little puppies, so fat and snugly and pretty that Doris wanted to adopt them that very minute!

"Where'd they come from? Whose are they? Can we keep them? You won't let anybody take them away, will you, father?" Doris asked the questions so fast her father couldn't begin to answer.

"One at a time, Pussay," he laughed. "Old Maxie seems to have left them here. They belong to who ever will take care of them and you certainly can keep them, if you want to."

"A'd so it was settled. Doris chose a warm corner of the garage for her new family. Her father set to carpentering and fixed two nice comfortable boxes, one on top of the other so the little puppies would be up off the floor where they might get a draft. After that Doris was the busiest person in that whole family. For there is a lot to do if you have a family of young puppies—the floor to keep tidy, the boxes to keep fresh, water and food to carry and the general looking after things to remember.

When the puppies got old enough to crawl out of the box Doris had a happy time playing with them and she thinks any little girl who isn't big enough yet to school ought to have a family to keep her busy and happy.

"You won't let anybody take them away, will you, father?" asked Doris.

WHY WE DO IT

DORIS sneezed three times. "Oh dear!" she exclaimed, and then she sneezed again.

"Gesundheit," said Brother Tom who had just come home from Overseas Service.

"What does that mean?" asked Doris.

"A funny fat Fritzle taught me that when he was our prisoner," answered Tom. "It means 'good health to you.'"

"How queer," said Doris.

"Yes it is queer," agreed Tom, "how sayings that had a meaning long ago still are used by us, when they are practically meaningless. Now it happened that in the Middle Ages a plague spread over Europe, killing thousands of persons. The first symptom of this plague was sneezing. So whenever a person sneezed his friends and family feared for his life and wished him good health or called upon God to bless him and so divert the evil spirit of the plague. That is why we, today, say 'God bless you' whenever a person sneezes. And why the German children say 'Gesundheit.'"

I AM sure that a great many mothers have a pair of salt and pepper shakers around the house for which there is no means of holding them. The holder described today is the result of just such a condition in my home. We had two nice glass shakers, of the long slender kind, and they were continually falling over. At last it became tiresome and after a little time spent with a piece of paper and a lead pencil, the design as shown was evolved. It did not stop there, however, but the holder was constructed and is today serving a very practical purpose.

The best way to proceed in this construction will be to first get out a piece of stock for the part the holes are to be cut in. It is suggested that it be the same length as the bottom piece, and also as wide, with the height equal to two and three-quarter inches less the thickness of the bottom. This will give you a square piece of stock. From the center of the piece, lay out the holes and the part that is to be removed for the handle. Make the holes first, boring the hole with the proper size bit, then removing the balance of the stock with a chisel. To do a good job this part of the work should be laid out from both sides of the piece and the work should proceed in the same manner. Next remove the portion for the handle. Saw very accurately to the knife lines of your layout, then remove the stock with a chisel. Get out the bottom and glue to the part just finished. While the parts are drying, get out the stock for the handle. This piece should be one-inch wide at the top and an inch and three-quarters at the bottom. This is not the exact size for the bottom, but it is left big at that point to allow for fitting to the other part. A center line should be drawn on the piece to aid in properly assembling. This may be glued in position when the other parts are dry. Now lay out the curves on the ends and the sides and saw them to shape. This part of the work will be very much easier if a power band saw is available. The side curves, that is, the ones laid out on the ends of the piece, can be cut without using any special press for holding it flat on the table top of the saw, as the ends are broad enough to give a good support. When the curves on the ends of the piece, which we see in the front view, are to be cut, you will have a much different proposition. Some of the stock already having been removed, the piece will not have the proper support for sawing. This may be overcome by using a piece of stock four or five inches long and as high as possible, without interfering with the sight of the work to be cut, making sure that the faces of the piece are exactly square with each other. With one of these surfaces on the saw table and the other resting against the piece we are working on, you will have a support that will permit the cutting to be done without any trouble.

The making of the knob for the top of the handle will be somewhat difficult. First square it up to the largest dimensions and lay out and cut the mortise. Then lay out the various curves and cut to shape. All these curves are left for your own designing, so far as any actual layout of them is concerned. The limits are given and the curves are drawn within those limits, but the exact form of the curve is left with the individual.

Almost any kind of wood will be suitable for this holder. The one made as referred to above was from gumwood, stained to suit the dining table and buffet, then sanded. After being rubbed down, wax was applied. Be careful about the finish. Not much should be applied, and it should be in thin coats.
