DISARMAMENT WOULD SAVE U. S. HALF MILLION

By HARRY L. ROGERS, International News Service Staff Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15.—Half a billion dollars yearly can be saved to the United States almost immediately if the disarmament conference to be held in Washington this fall approves the plan of the Harding administration for substantial reduction in armaments, according to military and naval experts here.

Enthusiasts, who may be correct, place the saving which reasonably may be expected to result from the military disarmament at as high as $1 billion annually. Accepting the lower figure, the sum saved to the taxpayers of the United States for a period of 150 years, compounded every five years at 5 per cent, would considerably exceed twice hundreds of billions, or more than four times the total estimated wealth of the United States today.

In the year 1920 five great nations—Great Britain, the United States, France, Italy and Japan—spent for military and naval purposes $10,442,251,191. This sum is a little over $2,000,000,000 more than all those nations together expended for military purposes in the fourteen years extending from 1906 to 1921. It has been estimated that in order to pay for the tremendous armaments now in contemplation a tax equivalent to $10 for every man, woman and child in the world would have to be levied.

War the Greatest Drain. Of the billions of dollars raised each year by every conceivable sort of taxation more than 90 per cent goes either to prepare for future wars or to pay the expenses of wars that have already been fought. To be more specific, statistics show that out of every dollar raised by taxation ninety-two cents is spent for things resulting from or appertaining to war.

The cost of the World War alone, both in lives and in money, is almost beyond realization. Thirty millions of people perished by weapon, by gas, disease or hunger, to say nothing of other millions who were blinded or maimed; and it has been estimated that if an earthquake should swallow up the whole United States it could destroy no more wealth than was consumed in that world conflagration.

Although the United States entered the war somewhat later than the other nations its expenses were greater during the comparatively short period of its participation than in all the preceding wars in history. In December, 1918, the month following the signing of the armistice, our expenditures were much greater than for all that period of seventy-two years before the civil war. During the single month of December we expended such large sums of money as in the first eleven years of our nationhood.

The following figures cast interesting light upon the manner in which Expenditures for armament have increased in the United States. In 1859 the per capita expenditure was $1.77; in 1860 $2.91; in 1870, $7.61; in 1880, $5.28; in 1890, $4.75; in 1900, $6.59; in 1910, $17.20 and in 1919, $144.77.

Education Figures Least. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the appropriations for the national government aggregated $2,286,527,869. Of this sum there was expended, for the year and navy department, $1,424,178,567, or 62 per cent of the entire amount; $1,555,000,000, or 67 per cent went for previous wars, in the way of pensions, etc. For primary functions of government $131,000,000 was expended, or about 5.2 per cent of the whole.

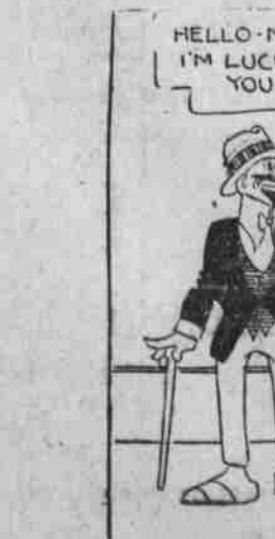

For public works of every description the government paid out $165,000,000. For research and educational development this nation lavished the sum of $57,983,660, or 1.99 per cent of the whole sum expended.

In other words, for the various departments of research, for the incubation of the principles of good citizenship, for the Americanization of foreign elements and for such other educational work as the government supports wholly or in part the United States appropriated 1 per cent of $76 and a half billions of dollars, while for wars, past and expected, nearly 95 per cent.

Must Pay for Past Wars. Many American statesmen assert that if the coming conference shall prove as successful as it is reasonable to expect the proportion of our future expenditures will be reversed; that is, ordinary governmental functions for good roads, public buildings, capacious harbors, irrigation projects, reclamation of swamp lands, penitentiaries, the aged, educational work, scientific research, and the like will expend 95 per cent of the whole, and for the armament of such a police force as may be decided upon, 7 per cent. It is recognized that this objective cannot be fully attained for many years, however, for the wars of the past must first be settled for.

President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes are indulging in an Utopian dream as to what may be accomplished, but are proceeding about their task in a thoroughly practical and business-like way. They know that complete disarmament is not possible in the present day and age, but they believe that if the great powers of the world get around a table and face the facts squarely they can come to some agreement which will make possible a material reduction in armaments, thus enabling the various governments to lift from the shoulders of the people a part of the enormous burden of taxation which they now bear.
