UNDERTAKERS WOULD WIPE OUT POTTER FIELD

ST. JOSEPH, Mo., Aug. 20.—(U. P.)—One well-known institution connected with every city of any size in the United States will soon disappear if plans of William Fleeman, a young undertaker of this city, are successfully carried through. The institution, which young Fleeman plans to wipe out of existence is the Potter's Field. There will be no more unidentified dead buried in his place.

Fleeman has organized an Identification Bureau. Its members are all undertakers. The bureau plans to have a representative in every community in the country. The death of every unidentified person, man, woman or child will be reported to the bureau immediately by members, and the description of the body and all clues with it will be sent out to every other member. Fleeman believes that in nine cases out of ten the bureau will be able to identify the dead person and the body can be recovered by relatives of friends.

DIVER SAYS 3 BODIES ARE ENTOMBED IN COUPE

SUMMIT, Ill., Aug. 20.—(U. P.)—The bodies of three persons are entombed in a coupe at the bottom of an 80-foot quarry pool, according to Jack Blair, a diver engaged in salvaging automobiles from the pool, where they and people who wanted to collect insurance, plunged them. Blair says over 100 cars are at the bottom of the deep water. The police are conducting a search for the bodies, following Blair's inability to recover the couple with its ghastly passengers.

THE TWILIGHT STORY HOUR.

By Nettie Gardner White

There is, to my mind, nothing more potent for discipline or for creating confidence between a mother and her child than a "twilight story hour."

A daily story time may sound like romance but it is very practical and accomplishes more good than a thousand scoldings. There is a story somewhere for every phase of character growth, and any librarian will help a mother to find these stories. If there is no library available, there can be no better investment for the character-building of your child than the purchase of a few good story books. The child lives in a world of fiction. Do not deprive him of your companionship in that legitimate, fascinating realm.

There come in every day, small vexations, irritations because a child does not comprehend grown-up standards or is mischievous or wilful. Never let your boy or girl go to bed with the heard mothers say the d. the veayo day's tangle unsmoothed. I have heard mothers say, "I'm too tired when night comes!" or "I'm going out tonight—I can't be bothered." The one who "can't be bothered" perhaps does not realize that a man or a woman with breadth of vision and an imagination to accomplish great things may be in the making during that few minutes of every evening. The mother who is "too tired"—and there are so many of them,—perhaps does not know what a blessed restfulness it is to have the children on her lap or about the fire with her, quiet after the day's excitement, listening with wide eyes to the twilight story. It is as soothing to the mother as to the children, and there is an intimacy growing out of that time which never ceases to be a blessing in after years.

You may say you have not the time to learn stories;—would reading them do us well? For a score of reasons it would not. If you are really desirous of the best for your children and are looking for some way to make a beautiful harmony out of your lives together, you will find the time. It does not take more than a few minutes to read a story, and you can go over it in your mind while you are washing the dishes or preparing the vegetables for dinner. Perhaps the longest time required is in choosing the right story to tell at the right time.

As you study these stories, you will find that your own character is expanding too. There is a lesson for grown-ups in all the old fairy tales and in many of the new ones. The story hour will keep your imagination from becoming dulled, it will quicken your sense of humor, it will make you young with your children and better able to enter into every mood and cranny of their child life.

Do not think that this method of disciplining is too indirect, that the moral of the story will be lost in the interest of the story itself. It has been proved repeatedly that this is not true, even when it may seem so at first.

Be consistent in the story-telling if you undertake it. Do not do it one night and neglect it the next. Make it a part of every day and it will soon come to be the sweetest, most restful and helpful time both to yourself and your children.

Amateurs in the Making

Of course, the first obligation of rearing children rests upon the parents, and there should be no effort upon the part of any other agency to usurp their rights in this respect. Nor should they be relieved of any of their responsibility. But the nation has an interest in the boys and girls who tomorrow are to constitute its citizenship, and it is a national duty to work in conjunction with the parents to see that the morals of the children rest on a solid foundation.

LORRAINE MARTIN'S pen point stuck in the paper several times while she was writing today. The teacher told her to be more careful and asked her how she'd like to write with the kind of pen they used in Washington's time. Lorraine didn't know what she meant so the teacher drew a picture of the crude old pen on the board. Follow the dots and see what it was.
