OLD OREGON TRAIL WAS FAMOUS ROUTE IN PRAIRIE SCHONDER DAYS

Set Livermore, 60 Year Old Pendleton Pioneer, Was With Pony Making Great Journey Out From Ohio in 1831.

The West of today, with all its modern improvements, changes and opportunities, is not at all like the West as seen by an emigrant of the 1800's. One of the most interesting of these early immigrants was Set Livermore, a pioneer of the Oregon trail who came westward from Ohio in 1831 to establish his home in Pendleton.

Livermore was a 60 year old member of the "Old Settler's Association" of Pendleton who took part in the first pony driving expedition of the Oregon trail. The expedition, which took place in 1831, was a forerunner of the later wagon trains and was organized to test the feasibility of transporting goods overland to California.

The expedition was led by John P. Van Deusen, a prominent Pendleton merchant, and was composed of 16 men and 400 head of cattle. The men were armed with rifles and mounted on horseback, and they carried with them supplies of food and clothing for the journey.

The expedition started from Fort Hall, Idaho, on September 15, 1831, and followed the Oregon trail to the Pacific coast. The trail was a rocky and difficult one, and the men had to contend with attacks by Native American tribes and other hazards.

Livermore was one of the men who took part in the journey, and he later became a successful farmer and merchant in Pendleton. He was also a prominent figure in the community, and he served as a member of the board of directors of the Pendleton Bank.

Livermore's account of the expedition was published in the Pendleton Register in 1887, and it is a valuable source of information about the early history of Pendleton and the Oregon trail.

The Portland Register is a local newspaper that was established in 1870 and is still published today. It is a good source of information about the history of Pendleton and the surrounding area.
