Committee Spent Almost Whole Year of 1913 in Probing War Between Men and Operators

BY J. BART CAMPBELL
International News Service Staff Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26.—What is the matter with West Virginia?

The question is one a special senate investigating committee, is wrestling with. It hasn't found an answer yet. Ever since trouble started in the Kanawha valley coal fields as far back as the spring of 1912—more than nine years ago—the question has kept bobbing up with every fresh recurrence of violence and sudden death.

A senate committee spent a large part of 1913 conducting what was known as the Paint Creek and Cabin Creek investigation. A member of that committee was Senator William E. Kenyon, republican of Iowa, who is chairman of the present committee.

In a report he made to the senate in January 1914, Kenyon pointed out that he had asked Bishop P. J. Donahue, a Catholic prelate familiar with the turbulence of the West Virginia mines and wooded hills, what was the "fundamental trouble."

"He answered that the causes were deep rooted and very obscure to a man unless he thinks, and thinks, and thinks, and traces the roots down into the primary causes," Kenyon stated. He quoted the bishop as saying: "I should say 15 I were asked to put it very briefly that it is human greed on both sides."

In commenting at the time on the bishop's statement, Kenyon wrote: "It is difficult to realize how there can be much human greed on the side of a man who is supporting a family and working day by day in the mines at ordinary living wages, but there is greed on the part of the owners of the property, and there always will be such greed."

More than seven years after Kenyon so quoted Bishop Donahue Senator Caraway, democrat of Arkansas, sat listening to testimony given recently before the present senate committee at Washington.

Had No Remedy to Offer. "I am inclined to think that there is a good deal of responsibility on both sides for the troubles they have been having down there in West Virginia," Caraway remarked. "It appears to me that the fault lies with both sides," said Senator McKellar, democrat of Tennessee. Several senators joined with Kenyon in seeking to develop a solution of the situation which has kept the West Virginia coal fields in a condition of civil war for more than nine years and necessitated lately the intervention of federal armed troops when the state government of the state confessed the state government was helpless.

Caraway's comment was made while D. C. Kenney, a hard-fisted Scotch-American, formerly president of the West Virginia local of the United Mine Workers and now secretary of the Kanawha Coal Operators' Association, was testifying.

Kenney did not explain how he had switched from the miners' organization to a company of operators, but he showed his long familiarity with the Paint Creek and Cabin Creek mines which had been the center of another senatorial investigation years before.

And he had no remedy to offer for the killings and conflicts as prevalent in 1912 and 1921.

"If the operators will not employ men that belong to the unions and the unions will not permit men to work who do not belong to the unions," Kenyon inquired of him, "and as a result the country's coal supply is diminished, where does the great third party, the public, come in?"

"That is up to them to solve," responded Kenney. Kenyon bent forward as though not sure that he had heard the witness rightly. "It is up to the public to solve?" Kenyon asked. "Yes," Kenney answered. "And you have no solution to offer?" Kenyon pursued.

"I do not think I have," Kenney responded. "But where does congress come in on the great third party to all these troubles?" Kenyon persisted, "the public?"

"That is a big question," Kenney parried. "That is why I am asking you the question," Kenyon replied. "It is the one thing that has not been answered. The forces on the one side say: 'We have a right to organize,' Kenney said. 'The other side says: 'You haven't a right to organize,' and that is where you get your conflict, your question of where the rights of one begin and the rights of the other stop."

Kenyon shook his head sadly. "Years ago, when we investigated the Paint Creek and Cabin Creek disorders, the same question remained unanswered," he said. And his report to the senate in January, 1914, was recalled.

"The basic cause is the private ownership of great public necessities, such as coal; this coupled with human greed, incident to such ownership, has brought about the deplorable and un-American conditions in the West Virginia coal fields."
