RICH YUKON MAN TURNS TRAMP TO FIND GIRL HE RESCUED IN FROZEN SNOW ONLY TO LOSE HER

BY JACK BRISTOL
(International News Service Staff Correspondent)
CHEYENNE, Wyo., Oct. 12.—Some- where on the road, either tramping along the dusty highway or rolling with a freight train and headed East, a tramp who in reality is not a tramp and who has taken advantage of the present condition of unemployment and the fact that there are no stamps to bring to a conclusion a picturesque romance which started three years ago in Alaska.
His name is Jack Searles, of Yukon, whose home is on a big timber claim in Alaska, and he is seeking a girl whose name and address are alike unknown to him. He is not even sure she is in the United States, but he is "taking a chance."
Searles told one of the most remarkable stories ever offered while he was eating the meal he had earned for shopping some firewood at a local residence.

"I'm no tramp," he said. "I'm not even out of a job. My home is in Alaska. I own enough timber to build a town nearly as big as this. I am trying to find a girl I saw once. And when I learned of the big number of men who are out of work and who are tramping it in the States the idea came to me that by knocking around myself, by posing as a tramp and shopping wood at people's houses, or doing anything else that came along, I might find her. No use trying to get anybody else to find her, because I have no picture, don't know her name or her address, but I'll know her if I ever see her again."
"Almost seven years ago I was going to marry a girl. The war came and I enlisted in a Canadian Regiment. I was overseas through the whole war, and when I came home the girl, who had promised so much, was married and had two children. My faith in girls went out like the ice on the Yukon. I went to my claim and was living alone. Then, three years ago this winter, I found another girl.

"I was coming down from White Horse, and it was snowing hard. Had eight dogs and a load of furs. When I got square in the trail, I found this girl, unconscious and partly frozen. I unloaded two sacks of flour and piled her on the led and rushed on in haste for my shack on Absorka Creek."
"When we got there I took the girl in the house. Her left arm and leg were badly frost-bitten, so I went to work on her" as being her out of it. All you can do when they get nipped like that is pack them in snow, so I took most of her clothing off, laid her on my bunk and packed snow around her. I rubbed snow on her side and wherever she was frost-bitten until I could see her coming out of it. She finally came to, but was delirious. I fixed her some grub and started out for Yukon to get a doctor. It was fifty-four miles, and the snow was light. Traveling was hard.
"I was gone for two days. When I got back with the doctor my shack was cleaned up like I had never seen it cleaned—dishes all washed, floor swept, and everything very tidy—but the girl was gone. All she left me was this," and he produced a small linen handkerchief from an inner pocket.
The suggestion that she might have taken a husband in these three years was waved lightly aside by Searles. That she might be living in a hotel or straitened house where his clever scheme for discovering her would fail because of the impossibility of these places to even the most romantic hobnob seemed to concern him not a whit.
"I'm going to knock at some door some of these days and that girl's going to open it. I feel it in my bones," he declared.
Searles is about twenty-six years old, tall and broad-shouldered, with the complexion peculiar to men who have lived in the cold regions just before the Circle in the North. His eyes

The board of public works has granted the Salvation Army permission to erect booths along the sidewalks in the downtown district, at which doughnuts and coffee will be served to the former service men. The only request is that the boys who fought the Hun step right up and make their presence known to the "lassies."
Brigadier John C. Smith, commander of the Salvation Army forces in Kansas and Missouri, has ordered every officer under his command exclusively to relief and rescue work, to devote his or her time during the convention to assisting and serving the Legionnaires in every manner possible.
