PERSONS WHO VIOLATE FOOD AND DRUG ACT NOT SO NUMEROUS NOW

Fewer Violations Found by Men in Federal Service Than Formerly Prevailed.

The manufacturer who violates the Federal Food and Drug law today is an artist compared with the violator of a few years ago. He does not offend so frequently or so flagrantly, but he is harder to catch. The gross and crude violations so frequently found during the early days of the law's enforcement have given place to more subtle forms that, to be detected, require more careful investigation, says the chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, United States Department of Agriculture, in his annual report. On the whole, violations are much less frequent. Only a small portion of the food and drugs in interstate or foreign commerce is either adulterated or misbranded.

In the enforcement of the Food and Drugs Act during the last year, the Bureau of Chemistry recommended the seizure of 1477 shipments and criminal prosecutions in 698 cases. The seizures and prosecutions recommended were based most frequently upon shipments of patent medicine including stock remedies, stock feeds, beverages, eggs, food colors, fish and shellfish, salad oils, vinegar, artificial sweeteners and tomato products, but included a considerable number of other food-stuffs.

The activities of the year on patent medicines included 966 actions directed mainly toward the elimination of false and fraudulent claims on the labels regarding curative powers for a great variety of diseases. The stock feed cases, 152 in number, were based on products deficient in protein or otherwise failing to conform to the claims made upon the labels.

Imitation fruit beverages sold under labels implying the presence of substantial quantities of fruit juice were encountered, but an increasing number of manufacturers have revised their labels to accord with the true composition of their products, or have actually incorporated fruit juice as an essential ingredient of the article.

Vinegar was the basis of 90 actions under the law. It was necessary to continue the seizure of vinegar made from dried apple products bearing labels which represented it as manufactured from the pressed juice of fresh apples. This type of substitution has exerted a seriously demoralizing effect upon the trade in genuine apple cider vinegar, says the report.

The short-weighting of tins of vegetable oil was one of the most persistent and petty types of violation of the Food and Drugs Act encountered. There was found a widespread practice among the smaller packers of vegetable oils to put out packages showing a comparatively small but constant shortage from the quantity stated on the labels. In the long run this shortage results in an unfair but substantial profit to the packers at the expense of the consumer, says the report. These packers also persisted in adulterating olive oil with cheaper vegetable oils and in selling the cheaper product under labels implying that it was olive oil. Repeated actions have been brought in an endeavor to control this type of violation.

Oysters and scallops, adulterated with water, the cheapest and most prevalent of all adulterations, were the basis of numerous prosecutions. Actions on colors have resulted from the sale of dyes represented as suitable for use in food which were either harmful in themselves or contained deleterious impurities, such as arsenic or were mixed with large quantities of inert material having no coloring value. Tomato products required much attention, owing to the practice of some manufacturers of using rotten and decayed stock, or of adulterating with water or material made from tomato waste.

So-called lithia waters containing only the merest trace of lithium, but alleged to be of the greatest therapeutic value because of their lithium content, have been virtually eliminated from the market. Interstate commerce in mineral waters and other drugs alleged to contain radium which were put on the market following the announcement that radium effected wonderful cures, threatened to develop to large proportions, but was stopped before it attained much momentum.

Effective campaigns have been carried on to eliminate from interstate commerce shipments of milk and cream highly contaminated with bacteria. Some contaminated mineral springs have been closed, while in others the manner of handling the products and of purifying it have been revolutionized. Methods have been devised for the detection, by means of the microscope, of decomposed fruits and vegetables in prepared food products. Investigations have been made to establish as fully as possible the character of the practices necessary to protect consumers from food poisoning, and the information has been disseminated widely.
