AIRPLANE MADE THAT WILL GO STRAIGHT UP

DENVER, Colo., April 21.—(U. P.)—Airplanes that come straight down have been plentiful. But it took a Denver inventor, Chas. S. Barrett, to make one that will go straight up. If full-sized planes work as well as his model has, air transportation has been revolutionized. The most troublesome problem of the aviator in practical flying is the necessity for a flying field.
Barrett's plane, if successful, would alight on top of the postoffice building in the heart of a city, never stop the engine, change pilots and mail pouches and be on its way. It would hold almost perfectly still over certain places in the Grand Canyon where men have never been, while observations were made.

The main difference between his plane and the monoplane is that the wing is circular and so made that it becomes a vertical propeller with the pull of a lever.
The motor power is readily shifted from the usual propeller to the new one and the plane is lifted straight in the air instead of running along the ground before taking off. Barrett has tried out his plane on a model and says it worked perfectly. Several investors have offered to put up money enough to develop the idea, but Barrett is looking for a certain kind of a partner.

"I do not want to get rich, though the invention is worth a fortune," he said. "There is my guide."
He pointed to the Bible.
"I want a partner who will follow that, and use the proceeds from his plane for the benefit of mankind."
