

'DUM-BELL' DRESS PLAYED BY LINDSAY

DENVER, June 2.—Sarfarial idiosyncrasies should be included in the "tests" of the Denver juvenile court psychoanalysis chart, according to Judge Ben B. Lindsay, who declared, in sentencing a youth for delinquency, that off-smeared hair, bell-bottom trousers, low-cut vests, and "ruff-back" sleek haircuts were an indication of moral weakness. The noted jurist then proceeded to flay "dumb-bell" dress.

Judge Lindsay directed that in the future officers of the court add a notation on the cut of the hair and style of dress to the physiological and psychological data and family history now a part of regular reports on delinquency cases.

Judge Lindsay announced his new found psychological observations when Howard Crane, nineteen, appeared before him on a charge of having been played on after conviction of stealing an automobile. Young Crane left the jurisdiction of the court for two months and went to Texas.

Crane is a tall, stoop-shouldered youth, whose long hair was combed straight back to the collar of his coat and shone like a patent leather shoe—a style which the court said, is popular among youths brought to court for amorous offenses.

"Son," Judge Lindsay said when Crane appeared looking like a matinee idol, "how did your hair get that way?"

"I use water to make it lay down," Crane responded.

"But why do you cut it that way?" the court asked, continuing:

"It is a strange thing that hair-cuts of that type seem to be correlated with a certain kind of weakness. Do you spend your afternoons at drug store fountains sipping lemon cokes through a straw?"

Judge Lindsay declared himself in favor of hobbled hair for girls, but frowned on the "mat flapper."

"I only wish I was sending you some place where they would give you a man's haircut," Lindsay announced in sentencing Crane to thirty days in jail.

IT'S A CHEERFUL GAME THEY'RE PLAYING NOW.
