VACATIONING IS GREAT SPORT—WHEN SOMEONE CARRIES THE BAGGAGE.

BRITISH AT MERCY OF GAS AND FIRE WEAPONS

By CHAS. EDWARD MORRIS

(United Press Staff Correspondent)

LONDON, July 17.—(U. P.)—"England is today at the mercy of the first hostile power that chooses to attack her from the air."

Such is the cry of warning being insistently sounded by armament experts in the London press.

A former member of the Allied Commission to Germany has publicly declared that that country is now armed with incendiary and poison-gas bombs which in one raid could paralyze the very heart of the British Empire and bring a horrible death to most of London's citizens. The bombs to which I refer exist now, at this moment, and were war declared, could and would be used tomorrow.

Any power may use them at any moment. So small and light are they that thousands of them could be carried by any average-sized commercial aeroplane. A fleet of aeroplanes would carry sufficient to set all London afire, past any hope of saving. So grave is the menace alleged from the "pitiful inadequacy" of England's air force, that pressure is being brought to bear upon the government by the proponents of aerial preparedness. Editorial writers are devoting columns to the situation in the great national dailies.

Some military experts declare that, in defiance of the Treaty of Versailles, the Germans are secretly manufacturing tons of fire and gas bombs. These terrible engines of death and destruction, say officials who have examined some of those confiscated in Germany, are a thousand times more deadly than the most vivid imaginings of fiction. They are of two kinds; incendiary and poison gas.

Incendiary Bombs.

The incendiary bombs are in the form of metal cylinders, about nine inches long and two inches in diameter. They weigh less than a pound apiece. The cylinder is made of a material called elektron, considerably lighter and stronger than aluminum. The composition of this metal is a closely guarded German secret. The bombs are filled with a powder called thermit, which ignites when the bomb strikes the ground. The thermit and elektron then fuse together and form an incandescent mass of white-hot metal that will melt its way through armor-plating. Nothing can extinguish it. A pinch of the powder ignited on a penknife blade caused the metal to run like candle wax.

The poison-gas bomb, even more terrible than the fire bomb, is simply a glass globe, four inches in diameter, filled with a dark brown liquid, which, when liberated, generates thousands of cubic feet of deadly gas. Escape from its death-dealing fumes, which are able to penetrate even into cellars, basements and underground railways, would be impossible.

It is stated here that just before the armistice the German high command openly boasted that the perfection of the elektron bomb gave them the means successfully to end the war. British threats of retaliation in kind were the only deterrent to the carrying out of the boast.

England's Threat.

"If the English secret service had not discovered that the Germans were making these bombs," say the public men now fighting for the re-establishment of England's lost ascendancy in the air, "London or Paris might have been annihilated by a single flotilla or bombing plane." "It was only our threat to destroy a German town for every such bomb dropped in England—and the ability of our air forces to back up that threat—that gave us the whip hand." "Now that our air force has sunk into such dangerous inferiority, we no longer have that whip hand. We must lose no time in regaining it. The nation's safety demands instant action on the part of the government."

Caught Robbers In Prize Ring

By JOHN O'BRIEN

(United Press Staff Correspondent)

PARIS, July 17.—(U. P.)—When Inspector Balaguerie, of the Paris central office squad, who was watching a boxing bout in the cellar of a Montmartre saloon the other night, noticed the kind of gloves the fighters were using he put two and two together rapidly and before the night was over two much-sought-for burglars and a "fence" were behind the bars.

Balaguerie, who won the Legion of Honor ribbon on the battlefield, is an inveterate habitue of the ring. He was invited to a match between Charles Monin and Paul Mirandier, waiters by profession, boxers in the making perhaps, and, as it turned out, devoting their leisure moments to other more lucrative but less legitimate occupations.

Monin went to the mat and took the count in the third round. He was in pretty bad shape and Balaguerie went into the ring to see if he might not be of service. Getting close to the fighter, he observed that the gloves on his hands were the rubber kind used by burglars to prevent finger prints being left on the furniture.

Judicious questioning of Monin and Mirandier led to confession that they were the authors of dozens of mysterious robberies of saloons, cigar stores, jewelry stores and so on. Besides having used chloroform in taxicab robberies in the Bois de Boulogne, they gave the address of the man who purchased the product of their crime and he, Jean Vibert, joined them in the depot early the following morning.

J. E. Harter, who has been connected with the federal agent office at the college for many years, has been transferred to the federal office at the college for many years.

Modern Amazon

Like the Amazons of old, women in the south of China are ready to go to war, equipped like the one above. They are of the element which is supporting the Canton government.
