CONFIDENT THAT ILL FATED LINER WILL SOON RISE FROM OCEAN

By C. E. MORRIS

(United Press Staff Correspondent)

LONDON, July 19.—(U. P.)—Speculation is rife here and on the Continent as to the possibility of raising the Lusitania.

Whether the salvaging is successful or not, revelations of historic import are expected to follow the attempt.

Did the Lusitania carry munitions? That is the most question which the salvaging operations are expected to clear up.

The German press is taking a particularly keen interest in the project. Berlin papers, which have recently been devoting considerable space to discussions of war suits, are agitating for the appointment of a German official witness of the salvaging attempt.

Count Charles Zaradi Landi, who will command the specially-equipped salvage ship, "Semper Paratus," is confident of success.

"The Lusitania," he told an interviewer, "lies in 250 feet of water on a clean gravel bottom. No attempt has ever been made to raise her, because the limit of diving possibilities has hitherto been not much more than 120 feet. The new diving suit which I have invented will enable my men to work at a depth of 500 feet."

"Do you expect to bring the Lusitania home under her own steam?" the count was asked.

Engines Disabled.

"Perhaps not," the salver replied. "I expect to find her engines disabled by the torpedo that severed her main steam pipe, thus instantly stopping all her mechanical functions when she was hit. Had that fatal torpedo struck 50 feet further forward, she could have limped along those few miles and been tamely beached."

"If it is mechanically possible," said the count, "three days are all that are necessary to get the engines of a salvaged vessel in order again. There is no rust. The deeper the water in which a ship has been lying, the less rust there is."

Count Landi does not appear disturbed by the report that an American firm is already proceeding across the Atlantic to save the Lusitania.

"The Ayerdy Salvaging and Towing Company, of which I am managing director," he said, "has been granted a three-year contract by the Liverpool and London War Risk Insurance Company, the British owners of the vessel and her contents."

Count Landi, an Italian by birth, is a naturalized British subject. He spent years in Canada at ship salvaging and hydrographic surveys.

His Greatest Triumph.

One of the count's greatest triumphs as a salver was the raising of the French steamer "Evangeline," which was torpedoed near Corfu and sank with a heavy and extremely valuable cargo off the Madonna Rocks. The French Admiralty sent for Landi. Count Landi, an Italian by birth, is a naturalized British subject. He spent years in Canada at ship salvaging and hydrographic surveys.

After going down, examining the ship and estimating the difficulties, Landi said to the French commander: "I will have her up in six days."

The admiral laughed tolerantly. "She came up in five days, four hours and 22 minutes," said Landi in describing the raising of the vessel.

Landi has had sixteen years' experience in salvaging work. While operating under Sir Vincent Gough, of the British Salvage Company, of London with Constantinople as his base, he brought up many ships of all sizes in the Black Sea, the Dardanelles and the Sea of Marmora. During and since the war he has had charge of the salvaging operations of various companies chartered by the British admiralty.

One of the grim tales of salvaging that Count Landi has to tell is of the King Alfred. When she was torpedoed, a gramophone concert was going on in the ward room. "Rule Britannia" was being played as she sank. When the salvers brought up the gramophone half a year later, full of water but undamaged, the record was still in place. The machine was dried out and the unplayed half of the record was heard on the salvage ship.
