Conn. court rules against teen who didn't want chemo

Jackie Fortin, right, stands outside the Connecticut Supreme Court in Hartford, Conn., on Thursday with Judy Stephens, 51, a Connecticut woman who said she has survived brain cancer without chemotherapy.

The teen's mother, Jackie Fortin of Windsor Locks, said after the arguments Thursday that she wouldn't allow her daughter to die. The single mother said she and her daughter just want to seek alternative treatments that don't include putting the "poison" of chemotherapy into her daughter's body.

"This is her decision and her rights, which is what we are here fighting about," Fortin said. "We should have choices about what to do with our bodies."

Fortin and her lawyer said they are considering their next step after losing the case, but expect to go back to the trial court in an attempt to more fully explore the mature minor argument.

After Cassandra was diagnosed with high-risk Hodgkin lymphoma, she and her mother missed several appointments, prompting doctors at Connecticut Children's Medical Center to notify the state Department of Children and Families, court documents say.
