Cincinnati shooting puts spotlight on campus police

By MICHELLE R. SMITH
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — When an Ohio prosecutor charged a campus police officer with murder in the death of a driver during a traffic stop, he offered a harsh judgment on University of Cincinnati police, saying the school should not be in the business of law enforcement at all.

That statement and the circumstances of the shooting near campus have raised questions about college police departments, which often possess powers that extend beyond their schools' boundaries. More universities are adding officers and arming them, insisting they can better police and protect students than municipal officers.

The July 19 shooting happened about a half-mile from campus when UC officer Ray Tensing pulled over Samuel DuBose for a missing front license plate. DuBose, who was not a student, refused to get out of the car, and Tensing shot the driver once in the head.

Tensing was fired and has pleaded not guilty. His lawyer has said he feared for his life.

Word of the shooting traveled swiftly through college campuses like the University of Rhode Island, which armed its campus police this year after a 2013 incident in which students in a lecture hall thought they heard someone claim to have a gun. The faculty union fought the move, and its executive director said a shooting like the one in Ohio is what they feared.

"I could very easily imagine someone getting pulled over, someone mouthing off and boom," Frank Annunziato said. "It doesn't surprise me, and it does sicken me. People here are talking about it. I can tell you that."

The move toward campus police began in the 1960s, when student protests sometimes led to violent clashes with city police, according to Bill Taylor, president of the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators. He said campus communities have different needs and expectations, and campus police forces can tailor their work to the "clientele" they serve.

In the 2011-2012 school year, more than 14,000 sworn police officers were working on campuses — a 10 percent increase in the number of full-time sworn personnel since the 2004-2005 school year, according to a survey by the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics at four-year colleges with more than 2,500 students.

Seventy-five percent of campuses used armed officers, up from 68 percent, and more than 80 percent of sworn officers were allowed to patrol or arrest people off campus.

Campus police officers must meet the same state requirements as any other officer, Taylor said. Officers in his department at San Jacinto College in the Houston area are a mix of experienced and retired municipal officers, along with some recently out of the academy.

Oregon eCourt coming to Eastern Oregon

East Oregonian

Circuit courts of Eastern Oregon are joining Oregon eCourt, the statewide Web-connected court system. Officials said eCourt provides the public with easier access to state courts and cuts down the document load.

Roy Blaine is the trial court administrator for the circuit courts of Umatilla and Morrow counties. He said the eCourt software installation is a top priority for staff and means access to digital public records now takes at least a week, even if it's the district attorney's office that wants a digital file.

The new court software, Odyssey from Tyler Technologies, is a massive system, he said, that's replacing another massive system, the state's not-so-user-friendly Oregon Judicial Information Network, or OJIN. Circuit courts in Union, Wallowa, Grant, Harney, Baker and Malheur counties also will install the software to meet the go-live date of June 6, 2016, to complete the statewide roll-out.

Blaine said he and the rest of the court staff are learning the new system, and the year-long window for installation gives time for that education and to work out any computer hanguaps.

Phil Lemmon, spokesman for the Oregon Judicial Department, said eCourt is about making state court system more efficient and providing better access to public records. Rather than asking state court clerks for copies of documents, he said, eCourt allows users to read and obtain copies of documents through courthouse computer terminals or personal computers with a subscription.

Attorneys use eCourt to file digital paperwork, he said, and the general public will be able to file some basic paperwork too, such as for landlord-tenant issues.
