Unique woodwind quintet to play at arts center

East Oregonian

The City of Tomorrow, a woodwind quintet with unusual ambition, will perform in Pendleton.

The group of five world-class musicians seeks to give voice to emotions of people living in the world today. They make music to provide an outlet for reactions to environmental destruction, endless war, the overwhelming mass of information collected on humanity every day and other contemporary issues.

The quintet will play Friday at 7 p.m. in Pearson Auditorium at Pendleton Center for the Arts, 214 N. Main St. Tickets are $10.

Seeking to forge a new identity for the wind quintet, the City of Tomorrow commissions new works, seeks relevancy for older compositions from the 20th century and continues to shatter expectations for a concert of wind chamber music. This frequently means unexpected sounds, including conch shell horns, strange timbres coming from double-reed instruments, wails from the French horn, improvisation in the clarinet and a flute that can whisper, spit, talk and sigh.

Seating is limited to 100
