

Amazon opens its first bookstore as extension of website

By PHUONG LE Associated Press SEATTLE — Online retail giant Amazon opened its first brick-and-mortar bookstore on Tuesday, two decades after it began selling books over the Internet and helped drive a number of shops out of business.

the store or say whether it would open more retail locations. Amazon Books vice president Jennifer Cast told The Seattle Times, "We hope this is not our only one. But we'll see."

Employees smile as they unlock and open the door to the first customers at the opening day for Amazon Books, the first brick-and-mortar retail store for online retail giant Amazon, Tuesday, in Seattle.

heads over the irony of the physical location because Amazon is seen by some as one reason so many independent and other booksellers have gone out of business in recent years. "They're the dominant retailer in the country, and they kind of got there by playing real hard ball," said

John Mutter, editor-in-chief of the book trade newsletter Shelf Awareness. "They are considered the Darth Vader of the business because they play really brutally." Yet the store makes sense because it was a missing part of the company's book business, Mutter said. Sucharita Mulpuru, an analyst with Forrester Research, said the store appears to be an experiment to see what the company can learn. "If they sell books, awesome. Even if they don't sell books, there's a lot to learn about how people discover products, how they shop for products," Mulpuru said. "Does a physical store increase your likelihood to spend with Amazon in general? Does it make you more loyal to Amazon?" Peter Aaron, owner of Seattle's independent Elliott Bay Book Co., which offers about 160,000 books, said he wasn't sure what to make of the move by the online retailer. "I can't imagine that there would be any profit, especially if their pricing is identical to the prices online, given rent and staffing," he added.

Teens spend an average of 9 hours a day with media

NEW YORK (AP) — Teenagers spend nearly nine hours a day on media and despite all the new options, music and television remain the favorites. The organization Common Sense Media is releasing an exhaustive study Tuesday on how kids relate to their various devices. One concern is the number of youngsters who feel comfortable listening to music or texting while doing homework. The study says two-thirds of teenagers say they listen to music every day, and 58 percent watch TV. Only 45 percent say they use social media each day, with 36 percent saying they enjoyed that activity "a lot." Boys are much more apt to play video games, while girls are likely to spend more time reading or on social media.
