

Klamath dams agreement includes protections for farmers

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) — Agreements to remove dams along the Klamath River set to be signed on Wednesday seek to ensure that farmers and ranchers won't have to pay higher prices for water.

Tearing down the dams will allow endangered salmon and steelhead to return to parts of the river they have been unable to reach for nearly a century. The agreements seek to protect upriver irrigators from higher costs or reduced water supply because of measures needed to protect those fish.

The latest deal falls far short, however, of implementing a comprehensive settlement that farmers, tribes and conservation groups worked out with state and federal officials in 2010. That agreement would have also restored tribal lands and given more water rights to farmers and ranchers, but

This 2009 photo shows Iron Gate Dam on the Klamath River near Hombrook, Calif. It was strongly opposed in Congress, where Republicans are leery of removing dams. "Now we're regrouping, trying to figure out what's our path to solve those problems," said Tricia Hill, treasurer of the Klamath Water Users Association, which advocates for farmers and ranchers. "We've got rural communities that rely on the water for jobs ... and that hasn't changed." The latest plan is spelled out in two agreements that are scheduled to be signed Wednesday by Oregon Gov. Kate Brown, California Gov. Jerry Brown, high-ranking federal officials, tribal leaders and others in Klamath, California.

Under the latest agreement, the parties plan to take a piecemeal approach. They will bypass Congress and instead seek permission from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to remove four hydroelectric dams, which block fish migration and hurt water quality. They'll also seek to prevent negative impacts on farmers and other irrigators.

Taking dams off the table could make it more politically feasible for Congress to approve the water rights and tribal lands agreements.

Meanwhile, tribes and some conservation groups are celebrating the progress on removing dams. Dams alter water flows, and contribute to fish diseases and algae bloom problems. Three tribes depend on the fish for subsistence and ceremonial needs, and a fourth hopes fish will return once the dams are removed.

"They will recolonize the river immediately," said Brian Johnson, California director for Trout Unlimited, a conservation group that plans to sign the agreement. "They're there at the dam every year. So they'll start going back right away."

Not everyone is celebrating. Dam removal is a major improvement, but the guarantees for farmers and ranchers don't belong in the agreement, said Jim McCarthy of the conservation group WaterWatch.

"There's a bunch of little sweetheart deals that the irrigators want to maintain, and they're trying to caboose it on this dam-removal train," McCarthy said.
