A current exhibition at Maryhill Museum of Art explores commercially produced trade blankets as an important facet of American Indian culture.

Showcasing 20 pre-1925 blankets from well-known historic manufacturers, "A Kaleidoscope of Color: American Indian Trade Blankets" features blankets produced by Pendleton Woolen Mills, Buell Manufacturing Company, J. Capps & Sons, Racine Woolen Mills and Oregon City Woolen Mills. The blankets are from private collections and offer a rare opportunity to see some of the most colorful items ever created by American industrial designers.

Historically, American Indians fashioned warm wearing robes from woven cotton, yucca, feathers or rabbit skins, or from tanned elk and buffalo hide. Trade blankets made by outsiders first appeared on the continent in the 18th century, when the Hudson's Bay Company imported English "point" blankets.

From 1780 to 1890, these blankets were a staple of the fur trade, especially in Canada and the northern tier states. During the same period, Navajo weavers were known for their fine wearing blankets — often used as robes.

The practice of wrapping departed relatives in a new Pendleton blanket is still common in Navajo communities, said Rachel Bucci, Maryhill media and public relations officer.

At the end of the 19th century, traders encouraged Navajo customers to focus on the production of rugs for sale to distant markets. With many Navajo weavers changing their focus, enterprising American woolen mills began producing brightly colored blankets with bold geometric designs. Although created to sell to American Indians, manufacturers were dependent on sales to the non-native population.

"A Kaleidoscope of Color: American Indian Trade Blanket" runs through Nov. 15.

Maryhill Museum of Art is open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. It is located off Highway 97 near Goldendale, Washington. To get there, drive west on Interstate 84 and take Exit No. 104.

Admission is $9 for adults, $8 for seniors, $3 for youth age 7-18 and free for children 6 and under. Free family passes can be checked out from area public libraries, including Blue Mountain Community College. Also, Morrow County residents are admitted free Aug. 20-21.
