Activists clash with Portland police as council OKs contract

PORTLAND (AP) — Police used pepper spray and arrested nine people as demonstrators stormed City Hall in Portland, Oregon, Wednesday trying to stop the city council from voting on a new police contract that includes more pay for officers and raised questions about the future use of body cameras.

The demonstration forced Mayor Charlie Hales to stop the meeting, but city commissioners soon reconvened in a secure, third-floor room to vote while protesters from Black Lives Matter and Don't Shoot Portland were kept below.

Amid chants and shouts from below, the commissioners voted 3-1 in favor of the new contract, setting off another round of protests that briefly blocked public transit in the downtown core.

Protesters threw object at officers both inside and outside City Hall, the Portland Police Bureau said in a statement.

Protesters dispersed as darkness fell, but organizers said a demonstration was planned for Friday.

Hales' decision to move the meeting was unprecedented in recent city history, The Oregonian/OregonLive reported. The vote was streamed live on the city's home page. Police eventually forced the protesters out of City Hall and into the streets.

Several were hit by pepper spray as officers cleared the doors.

Hales, the outgoing mayor, said the contract was "good for Portland."

Protesters were angry that Hales was bringing the matter to a vote now instead of letting his successor, Mayor-Elect Ted Wheeler, take up the issue in January so there would be more time for public input.

Police watchdog groups-grew concerned earlier this month when an initial version of the contract guaranteed officers the right to view body camera footage before writing up any non-fatal encounters with civilians.

That language led to several smaller protests and sit-ins in the weeks leading up to Wednesday's vote.

Commissioner Nick Fish told KATU-TV in a live interview Wednesday that the contract did not include any language on body camera policy.

"It was carved out and will be discussed with the community later," Fish told the station.

In a blog post Tuesday, Police Chief Mike Marshman said the contract was urgently needed to help the city recruit new officers.

By the end of the month, the 880-member Portland Police Bureau will have nearly 90 vacancies due to retirements and another 385 officers are projected to retire in the next five years.

Better pay will help the city entice new hires and could deter current officers from leaving to work elsewhere, he said.

Marshman also said any policies developed around body cameras will include public input.

Hospital lifts ER quarantine after five develop hallucinations

COOS BAY (AP) — A hospital in Coos Bay has lifted a quarantine of its emergency room after a 78-year-old patient, her caregiver, two sheriff's deputies and a hospital employee all developed hallucinations.

The Coos Bay World reported Wednesday that authorities have not yet pinpointed what caused the episodes, but they believe it was something spread by direct contact. The sheriff's department says one possibility is a medicated patch.

The bizarre incident began around 3 a.m. when the elderly woman's caregiver called authorities to say people were vandalizing her car.

A responding deputy found nothing. The caregiver called back at 5:30 a.m. and was taken to the hospital after deputies decided she needed medical help.

Later, the two deputies who helped the caregiver, the caregiver's patient and a hospital staffer all developed symptoms.

Sheriff candidate fights internal investigation

BEND (AP) — A deputy running for Deschutes County Sheriff claims three internal investigations filed against him are a response to his candidacy.

The Bulletin reports that Deputy Eric Kozowski says three internal investigations filed against him in late September are retaliatory and deviate from standard sheriff's office procedure. Deschutes County Sheriff Shane Nelson says the investigations have followed policy and have nothing to do with the election.

According to court documents, one investigation stems from a citizen complaint claiming Kozowski failed to take a report on an unspecified incident in 2010, another is about Kozowski not arresting a wanted suspect in June, and another is over a statement made to the media in May.

ODOT to test weather-variable speed signs on I-84

LA GRANDE (AP) — The Oregon Department of Transportation is testing new speed signs that change the speed limit based on weather conditions on Interstate 84.

The La Grande Observer reports that over the past few weeks ODOT crews have been installing the variable-speed signs in a 30-mile corridor from Ladd Canyon to Baker City.

The new electronic message boards indicate a safe speed limit for vehicles in adverse weather conditions. Computers collect data regarding temperature, skid resistance and average motorist speed to determine the most effective speed limit for the area before presenting the limit on the sign.

The variable signs are expected to go live on Nov. 1.
