PENDLETON: Quezadas say first-floor apartments will be completed in 2022

met just before the council meeting, heard the Quezadas' $1.25 million plan to renovate old city hall into an apartment complex.

With the help of general contractor Casey Severe, Quezada explained how they planned to restore and improve old city hall over the next six years.

Quezada said the new roof will be put in by the end of the year, new windows installed in 2017, brickwork restored by the end of 2018 and first-floor apartments completed in 2022.

Quezada said bankers have told her that they'd be more willing to invest once the first three phases have been completed, so the family won't seek out private financing until 2021.

Although windows aren't set for installation until next year, Severe said the building could be sealed quickly to protect the interior from the winter wind and precipitation.

Quezada said she and several of her siblings are forming an investment group to help fund the project on their own and will be open to bringing in additional investors.

Several councilors expressed discomfort in providing public funding for a project that still had a lot of uncertainty surrounding it.

"From an appraisal standpoint, income producing properties are only as good as

... what you can shake out of that piggy bank," Councilor Paul Chalmers said. "As an empty shell of a building, there's no revenue generated from that piggy bank."

Councilor Chuck Wood, the chairman of the commission, said he didn't want to help fund a new roof only to see old city hall continue to fall into disrepair and resemble the abandoned Edwards Apartments, near Til Taylor Park.

Wood entertained a motion to grant 25 percent of the roofing costs, but since no councilor made the motion, the commission essentially denied the grant ask without taking a vote.

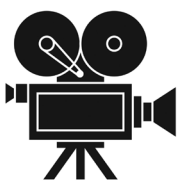

Even without financial support from the commission, Quezada said the family was committed to funding the roof themselves, enough evidence for the city council to provide the extension.

Mayor Phillip Houk said the deadlines provided incentive for the family to continue their efforts.

"To me, working with them, establishing timelines and delaying the $500 a day fine is worth saving the building," he said.

Chalmers and other councilors told Quezada that they would be more amenable to approving grants for old city hall once the roof was finished.
