- A wrong-way driver in Pendleton ended up in jail for driving drunk.

Oregon State Police reported trooper Darin Wong at 10:10 p.m. saw a white Ford van going the wrong way on Southwest Dorion Avenue. The van turned onto Court Avenue, where the trooper made the stop.

The driver, James W. Joseph, 62, of Salem, showed signs of impairment, state police reported, and the trooper took him to the Umatilla County Jail, Pendleton, for driving under the influence of intoxicants. Joseph's blood-alcohol level was .12 percent, above the legal limit.

State police also cited Joseph for careless driving and failure to obey the direction of travel.

Saturday

Sunday

- A Hermiston man did not get to complete a sobriety test when he became threatening to a cop.

Oregon State Police reported trooper Ryan Mazour at 12:47 a.m. on East Punkin Center Road, Hermiston, tried to stop a black Mazda for an equipment violation. The trooper turned on his car's emergency lights and siren, but the Mazda kept going.

The car "was all over the road," and stopped at the intersection of East Punkin Center at North Townsend roads, according to state police, and the trooper contacted the driver, who showed "multiple signs of impairment."

Ernesto Rivera Burgos, 42, eventually agreed to take a sobriety test, state police reported, then "became difficult, stopped doing the test, balled up his right fist and told the trooper, "I'm not going to take my eye off you."

Mazour stopped trying to test Burgos and arrested him for driving under the influence of intoxicants. The trooper booked Burgos into the Umatilla County Jail, Pendleton, where a test showed his blood-alcohol level was .19 percent, more than twice the .08 percent legal limit.

The trooper also cited Burgos for driving without a license.
