DEAR ABBY

Man's new job with an old flame gives his wife a chill

Dear Abby: My husband was recently offered a new job that carries with it a significant increase in salary as well as upward mobility. He was offered the job by a woman he used to work with years ago. She will be his new boss.

It was recently brought to my attention that not only were they co-workers, they also used to sleep together. He tells me there's absolutely nothing there, and that I don't need to be worried. However, I can't help but wonder why they have maintained contact for all these years, and why she sought him out to work for her.

She is also married, and I wonder if her husband knows their history, and if he would be OK with his wife's request to work with a former lover.

Am I overreacting? Or should people cut off contact with their exes once they are married? Should I be worried about a physical or emotional affair? I just don't have a good feeling about this. Thank you for your help. — Needs An Objective Opinion

Dear Needs: In a situation like this, much depends upon the individuals involved and the circumstances of the breakup. Not all romances end acrimoniously. Sometimes they gradually diminish and the people involved move on.

It would be interesting to know who told you your husband and this woman were once lovers. If it was your husband, I think you have less to be concerned about than if it was someone "trying to be helpful." It is possible that the woman contacted your husband because she is familiar with his work ethic and his abilities and thinks he would be the best person for the job.

That said, however, there are four people involved in this situation. And your question about whether her husband is aware of their history is a good one, because he should be.

Dear Abby: I have a suggestion for your readers who take prescription medication. When they are finished with it, they should peel the label off the bottle, stick it to a piece of paper and send it through a shredder.

These labels contain a lot of personal information. If they fall into the wrong hands, they could become shopping lists for drug addicts and our landfills could become their next source. Better to be safe than sorry, if for no other reason than privacy. — Chet In Kentucky

Dear Chet: I agree!

DAYS GONE BY

Nov. 10, 1916

Though the formal celebration of President Wilson's victory will not be held in Pendleton until this evening, there was an impromptu demonstration last night when news was received that California was definitely in the Wilson column. At 9:30 the East Oregonian received a telephone report from the Portland Journal that even the Oregonian had conceded Wilson's election. This was the signal for another demonstration, and it was a significant thing that it was started by four republicans. Starting down the street, they soon gathered up a dozen or so men, secured more firecrackers, drums and horns and raised a din that aroused the town. They paraded through the streets, even going into the residence sections to serenade the homes of some of the republican leaders, danced war dances, yiped, yelled, danced and sang in their rejoicing. Before the impromptu celebration ended at midnight there were 150 or 200 in line.
