Anti-Trump protesters damage businesses, face pepper spray

Protesters march on their way to Waterfront Park in Portland on the third day of protests Thursday over the results of the 2016 U.S. presidential election. President-elect Donald Trump fired back on social media after demonstrators in both red and blue states hit the streets for another round of protests, showing outrage over the Republican's unexpected win. For more on Oregon's reaction, see Page 1C.

PORTLAND (AP) — An anti-Trump protest in downtown Portland escalated after some demonstrators smashed windows, spray-painted buildings and lit a dumpster fire, culminating with officers firing rubber baton rounds and arresting at least 26 people who refused to disperse.

Police declared Thursday night's protest of about 4,000 people a riot after "extensive criminal and dangerous behavior." Demonstrators threw glass bottles and a trash can at officers, whose repeated orders to leave were ignored. Police then fired rubber baton rounds and pepper spray at the group.

Officers took several protesters to the ground and arrested them. Police had warned on Twitter that those taken into custody could face a felony riot charge.

What started as a peaceful demonstration turned destructive when some protesters caused significant damage to vehicles at a car dealership, police said.

Some also used rocks and baseball bats to smash the windows of businesses and start small fires as they moved through the city's Pearl District, a showcase neighborhood and site of many boutiques and art galleries.

A woman threw laundry detergent at protesters, sparking an altercation.

"Many in crowd trying to get anarchist groups to stop destroying property, anarchists refusing," police tweeted.

Police told those who wanted to peacefully demonstrate to head back to Pioneer Courthouse Square and said at 10 p.m. that protesters who had not returned were under arrest. Soon after, a crowd marched through the streets.

Protest organizer Gregory McKelvey decried the vandalism in a statement early Friday. He apologized to businesses that suffered damage and said the group planned to help clean up.

"We made it very clear that ours was a movement born out of love, infused by peace and inhospitable to those that would put us all at risk in the name of actions that are inflammatory, divisive and strategically ill-conceived," he said. "That remains our goal."

The Oregon Department of Transportation intermittently closed portions of Interstates 5 and 84 in the area as a precaution during the protest. Officials urged travelers to watch for people in unexpected places on roads.

Portland Mayor Charlie Hales said earlier in the day that he supports peaceful protest by people exercising their constitutional rights but cautioned that walking on freeways and blocking light rail lines is dangerous.

Who are the Trump protesters? Students, immigrants, anarchists and more

PORTLAND (AP) — Donald Trump says the thousands of men and women taking to the streets to protest his election are "professional protesters incited by the media." But who are they really? The answer varies from state to state. The crowds include high school students, immigrants and even anarchists.

"There's no professional protesters here," said Jennie Luna, a 40-year-old professor of Chicano studies at California State University-Channels Islands, just north of Los Angeles.

The day after the election, she organized what she calls a "self-care circle of courage" on campus for students who needed an outlet for their distress over Trump's win. The event morphed into a rally and march that lasted several hours.

"I am fearful for what will happen to the undocumented, I'm fearful of losing my reproductive rights," she said. "And I'm fearful of the unknown." America's new president has made many promises about changes to "make America great again," such as undoing some regulations on companies, for example.

He has also made pronouncements that have struck fear within certain groups of Americans — women, Latinos, people with disabilities and racial minorities, among them. The protests that have spread across the nation are against Trump, but more pointedly, they are expressions of concern about how personal lives could change.

Isadora Clemente Zurie, 21, was among those at a Thursday night protest in Salt Lake City, Utah, riding in her wheelchair with the crowd.

"I'm disabled and I'm LGBT. I've been bullied all my life," she told The Salt Lake Tribune. "Now I'm in a world where for just being me, I could lose my entire life."

College students whose parents moved to the United States illegally are worried that Trump will follow through with his threat to rescind President Obama's executive order that protects young immigrants from deportation.

At a Thursday night protest in Philadelphia, 23-year-old Jeanine Feito held a sign that read "Not 1 More Deportation."

Protest organizers are using a tool that Trump made such effective use of — social media. Tweets and Facebook posts have called people to protests across the country. Trump's election spawned a popular new hashtag: "NotMyPresident."

Some of the protests are occurring in cities with a history of political activism such as Portland. In the 1990s, the staff of then-President George H.W. Bush dubbed the city "Little Beirut" because of the demonstrations his visits provoked.

In Louisville, Kentucky, after Trump's election victory 23-year-old activist Mallie Feltner looked online for an event to vent her frustration but found none. So she decided to organize her own. The call spread through social media and more than 1,000 people showed up for the Thursday night protest. They chanted about women's rights, gay rights, the rights of immigrants and African-Americans.

"My focus is showing solidarity to all of the people who felt disheartened and afraid like I did Wednesday morning," she said. "I want them to feel heard. I want them to know I'm not going to become complicit in it."
