DEAR ABBY

Woman weighs getting involved in neighborhood case of abuse

Dear Abby: I have always tried to be a compassionate person. I have experienced a lot of abuse, and I'm sensitive to others who go through it.

JEANNE PHILLIPS Advice

I am always lending them money. I have never said no when they needed it. To top it off, they lied to me about the check for an entire month.

Now my account is frozen and I am wiped out. I have two kids and one on the way, and recently I lost my job.

I'm torn about what to do. My heart says I should reach out to the people who live there and make friends with them.

How do we as a society not turn a blind eye to abuse in our neighborhoods and still protect ourselves and loved ones? I don't want to put my mother or myself in jeopardy, but I don't want the person/people in that house to think they are alone.

Dear No More: While I applaud you for being so caring, for your own safety, I caution you to proceed very slowly in getting to know these people. Some communities provide anonymous tip lines so citizens can report a crime without endangering themselves or their families.

Dear Abby: My parents and I were always close. However, recently they stole my debit card, my PIN and child support check.

am having trouble forgiving them. I am just so angry. Should I forgive them, or do I have the right to be mad?

Your parents stole from you and their grandchildren. They appear to have no conscience. Now you know what they are capable of, it is important that you keep your distance from them, or they'll do it again.

Dear Wondering: Yes. Today, the word "godparent" does not always have explicitly religious overtones.

Dear Wondering: Yes. Today, the word "godparent" does not always have explicitly religious overtones. A godparent can be anyone the parents trust to take care of their child in the event of the parents' deaths.
