Man arrested during May Day march charged with riot, arson

PORTLAND (AP) — A 22-year-old man has been charged with riot, arson and criminal mischief for allegedly throwing flaming flares during Portland's May Day march.

The Oregonian/Oregon-Live reports Damian Feller was charged Thursday. He didn't enter a plea.

He was arrested Wednesday after investigators reviewed video of the Monday events and received community tips.

An affidavit says after Fuller was arrested, police showed him a photograph of the person throwing the flares. The affidavit says Fuller told police, "I saw that online and knew I was (expletive)."

Feller is one of about two dozen people arrested in connection with the protest, which police deemed a riot and shut down after protesters set fires, smashed windows and spray-painted businesses.

Most protesters arrested during the march were released from custody Tuesday and are awaiting charges.

Students sue over suspensions for 'likes' on racist posts

By SUDHIN THANAWALA Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A California school district suspended a high school student after racist images that included nooses drawn around the necks of a black student and coach appeared on his social media site.

But a federal lawsuit says the district went too far when it also disciplined students who indicated they "liked" the posts on the Instagram account. The suit — filed Monday in San Francisco on behalf of four students — accuses the Albany Unified School District of violating students' free speech rights and says the district did not have the authority to suspend the students because the offensive posts were on a private account that had no connection with any official school activity or school account.

"This to me is no different than having a private drawing book and making some offensive drawings at home and sharing them with a couple of friends," said Alan Beck, an attorney for four students who "liked" or commented on the offensive Instagram account. "Does the school have the right to ruin my life over something I was doing at my house?"

Legal experts say the lawsuit will present federal courts with another opportunity to decide how strictly schools can regulate student speech. And it raises thorny questions about whether "likes" on social media should be treated similarly to the original posts.

In this March 26 photo, people attend a rally for the Albany for All to support unity and inclusiveness in response to racist and offensive posted on social media, at Albany High School in Albany, Calif. Four Albany High School students sued a school district after they were suspended over their responses to Instagram posts that included a black student and coach with nooses around their necks.

"Likes" are ambiguous in that they could be saying, "This is funny," "I agree with it," or "I don't agree, but I want to stand up for your right to say it," said Eugene Volokh, who teaches free speech law at the University of California, Los Angeles.

The racist posts on an Instagram account of a student at Albany High School surfaced in March, leading to protests by students and parents. Albany is an affluent community adjacent to Berkeley, a city that prides itself on its liberalism and political correctness.

The posts also included a photo of a black person next to an ape and jokes about students' weight and looks.

Superintendent Valerie Williams said in a statement that the district is reviewing the lawsuit, but it intends to take "appropriate action in responding to it."

The student who owned the account is also facing expulsion, according to his attorney, Cate Beekman. She declined to provide his name. He has not filed a lawsuit.

The lawsuit filed Monday represents four other Albany High School students — three of them Asian — who say they were suspended after or commenting on the Instagram account or indicating they "liked" a post. One of the students said

"yep" to another comment, according to the lawsuit. Another student commented that the account "is only targeting black people."

The other two students "liked" a few of the images posted on the account.

The lawsuit claims the district brought suspended students before the student body at a "public shaming" session during which they were cursed and jeered.

At a meeting later the same day, two suspended students were injured by an angry protester, according to the suit. The four students seek unspecified damages and a court order removing the suspensions from their records.

Schools have broad authority under federal law to limit speech at school that they consider disruptive, according to First Amendment scholars. But courts have disagreed about whether schools can punish students for off-campus speech that causes disruptions at school — a more likely scenario these days with the reach of social media — said Aaron Caplan, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

"In my own view, students are entitled to speak just like everyone else when they are off campus," Caplan said. "The school should not say, 'You engaged in free speech over the weekend on your own time, but we will punish you because your speech has ripple effects that we don't like.'"
