Wildfire losses in Columbia River Gorge

CASCADE LOCKS (AP) — New aerial photos show severe damage to some parts of the Columbia River Gorge from a large wildfire that continues to burn. The photos taken Sunday by The Oregonian/OregonLive show the areas most impacted by the blaze include Oneonta Gorge, Eagle Creek and Tanner Creek. McCord Creek near Cascade Locks and Moffett Creek are also severely burned. Some trails in the gorge won't open until spring and some may not open for a year or two. The fire erupted Sept. 2 and has burned more than 75 square miles. It continues to burn in some areas but is not expected to grow. The risk of rockslides and mudslides in the burned area is high as the winter rainy season begins.

Mother, four children killed in suspected drunk driving crash

SALEM (AP) — Authorities say a mother and her four children were killed in a head-on crash near Salem by a drunken driver who has a previous conviction for driving while intoxicated. The two car crash happened at 4:41 p.m. Sunday when a Land Rover driven by Favian R. Garcia, 27, of Gervais, collided with a Buick Century head-on, the Oregon State Police said Monday. The Land Rover was heading north, and the Buick was heading south. The two cars were negotiating a corner when they crashed. The Buick was driven by Lisette Medrano-Perez, 25, from Molalla. Her four children - an 8-year-old boy, a 6-year-old boy, a 4-year-old girl and a 2-year-old girl - were pronounced dead at the scene. Garcia, who had minor injuries, was arrested Monday on suspicion of five counts of manslaughter, driving while intoxicated, reckless driving and outstanding warrants from Marion County. It wasn't immediately clear if he had an attorney. Court records show Garcia pleaded guilty to driving under the influence of intoxicants in 2011 and was arrested on suspicion of the same crime in July. He was wanted on an outstanding warrant in that case for failing to appear for a July court hearing in Marion County.

New EPA plan could delay Portland Harbor cleanup

By CASSANDRA PROFITA
Oregon Public Broadcasting

The Trump administration has a new plan for the Portland Harbor Superfund site that Oregon officials say could reverse progress toward cleaning up toxic pollution in the Willamette River.

Oregon environmental regulators and officials with the city of Portland have sent letters to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency expressing their concerns about a draft agreement between the EPA and some of the companies responsible for cleaning up the site. The agreement would require redoing complicated environmental studies and investigations, they say, which would delay a process that has already taken more than 16 years. Furthermore, they say the EPA left key state and tribal leaders out of the negotiations and may have violated previous agreements. Just before President Donald Trump took office this year, the EPA released a plan calling for a $1 billion cleanup involving dredging and covering contaminated soil along a 10-mile stretch of the Willamette River known as the Portland Harbor Superfund site. Oregon Gov. Kate Brown released a statement Monday morning calling the new agreement "a significant setback" to those cleanup plans that could have impacts on Oregon's economy and the long-term health of the environment. "We must move forward with the cleanup of the Portland Harbor, but the federal administration's latest direction to the EPA undermines the progress we've made," she said. "I urge the EPA to honor its commitment to work collaboratively and transparently with the state, city, and all responsible parties that have long worked toward a thorough and cost-effective clean up of the Portland Harbor." In a letter sent Thursday, Oregon Department of Environmental Quality Director Richard Whitman told the EPA that after seeing a draft of an unexpected new agreement last week, his agency has "significant concerns" about how it was developed and the plans it lays out. The agreement appears to be designed to question the underpinning of the clean-up plan completed under the Obama administration, he wrote, "potentially leading to significant additional delays in the implementation of any remedy." He threatened to file a dispute unless the agency includes the state in a formal consultation. Portland Mayor Ted Wheeler sent a letter Friday echoing the DEQ's concerns and telling the EPA that the city is "deeply troubled" that key stakeholders were excluded from negotiations. Wheeler said in contrast to what the EPA told the public was supposed to happen next at Portland Harbor, "the draft work plan reopens and reanalyzes decisions that were already made through a lengthy and intensive process." The existing cleanup plan doesn't require repeating investigations and studies, Wheeler argued. "We appreciate and share the EPA's goal to move implementation forward as quickly as possible," he wrote, "but fear that the objectives described by DEQ in the draft agreement could steer the site off-course and even take implementation backward." It's unclear which of the dozens of potentially responsible parties are included in the agreement. The EPA has yet to comment on the purpose of the agreement and who is involved. Travis Williams, executive director of Willamette Riverkeeper, said his group and others are looking into whether the agreement is legal, but it seems to be "on the very edge of legality" from what he's seen so far. "I think a lot of us had concerns about the Trump administration with regard to Superfund, and if these letters reflect what is going on in this process it is exceedingly concerning for anybody who cares about the fate of the Willamette River," he said.
