Man arrested for stealing vehicles from Kennewick Police Department

East Oregonian

A man was arrested Monday in Hermiston for stealing a cargo trailer and two snowmobiles from the Kennewick Police Department back in January.
 Nathan Allen Olney, 36, of Hermiston was arrested on Agnew Road and charged with felony counts of theft by receiving, criminal conspiracy, three counts of possession of a stolen vehicle and theft in the first degree.
 According to the Umatilla County Sheriff's Office, the agency had been investigating Olney since January for allegedly stealing the trailer and vehicles from the Washington law enforcement agency.
 Back on Jan. 21, 2017, the sheriff's office recovered the trailer in a field off Colonel Jordan Road in Hermiston, after a citizen recognized it from a Facebook post. The two snowmobiles were recovered shortly thereafter, according to police.

Olney

According to the sheriff's office, their investigation led to Olney's involvement in the crime.
 On Monday, the office received a new report of a stolen 2014 Isuzu truck. The owner of the vehicle reported that he hired Olney to work on it at Olney's home, but it had since disappeared.
 The sheriff's office said police will also charge Olney with a felony charge of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, as a result of the recent alleged crime.
 Olney has been lodged at the Umatilla County Jail, Pendleton.

Self-taught rocket scientist sets new launch date

(AP) — Self-taught rocket scientist "Mad" Mike Hughes won't allow a little red tape to get in the way of his green light for a launch.
 All systems are go for his rescheduled steam-powered rocket attempt — in his view, at least.
 The 61-year-old limo driver who believes Earth is flat plans to climb into his homemade vessel Monday and rocket 1 mile over the ghost town of Amboy, California. He was scheduled to blast off last weekend, but he didn't have the proper permits from the Bureau of Land Management.
 He's relocated his launch pad about 4 miles from its original spot so he takes off and lands on private property.
 It may not be enough. The BLM said he still needs to fill out the permits. Hughes contends that shouldn't be required since he's flying on private land and has permission.
 "I'm moving forward," Hughes said Tuesday. "I'm a daredevil. I'm not much for authority or rules."
 In the meantime, he keeps rearing his rocket in the Mojave Desert and sleeping in a motor home that doubles as his rocket launcher. He still can't quite wrap his mind around how his project has generated so much buzz. He's been contacted by news outlets from all over the globe.

 "This is all just nuts, but I guess it's supposed to be," said Hughes, who will televise the launch on his YouTube channel and doesn't want spectators to show up out of safety concerns. "I've had people say so much, that I'm a fraud. I've had people email me and say, 'You're going to die.' I even had one woman ask me if we were all going to die on (launch day). But I've also had so much support. It's just crazy."

 His original intention was this: Set up his rocket that's built out of salvage parts and launch on an air strip next to a dilapidated hangar. He said a verbal agreement he received from the BLM a year ago fell through at the last moment.
 With no permit, his mission was postponed.
 "The BLM has a permitting process for recreational activity on public lands," BLM spokesman Stephen Razo said in an email. "Mr. Hughes has been made aware of this process by the local field office and stands ready to work with Mr. Hughes on his permit like any other once we receive an official permit request from him."

 Hughes said BLM representatives have since visited his location to check how things are going.
 "They've been very nice to me. I have no animosity," said Hughes, who transported his rocket to Amboy late last week, with his vehicle breaking down numerous times during the 100-mile trek. "Things come up and I expect things to come up. ... I understand it."
 Hughes has permission to be on the property from Albert Okura, who purchased the rights to Amboy in 2005 for $435,000. Hughes' new spot for a launch isn't exactly ideal, though.
 For starters, he had to dig ditches to level the rocket launcher, with three of the four tires now resting in holes. He's in the process of raising the 57-foot ramp, which takes about two days. He hopes to begin heating the rocket on Saturday morning.
