Judge: Washington lawmakers' emails, texts are public

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) — The emails, text messages and other records held by Washington state lawmakers are subject to public disclosure, a judge said Friday in a ruling in favor of a media coalition led by The Associated Press.

Thurston County Superior Court Judge Chris Lanese sided with the group that sued in September, challenging the Washington Legislature's assertion that lawmakers are excluded from stricter disclosure rules that apply to other elected officials and agencies.

While Lanese said the offices of individual lawmakers are subject to the Public Records Act, the Washington Legislature, the House and Senate were not.

But regarding the individual lawmakers named, Lanese said the statute was clear.

The law "literally says that representatives and senators and their offices are agencies under the Public Records

Thurston County Superior Court Judge Chris Lanese, right, speaks in court Friday in Olympia, Wash. Lanese said that the records of individual Washington state lawmakers are subject to public disclosure, a ruling in favor of a media coalition led by The Associated Press that sued the Washington State Legislature in 2017.

Act," he said from the bench. "The defendants have raised many different arguments contending that that is incorrect in this case. However none of the arguments advanced by the defendants here can escape the fact that the plain and unambiguous language of the statute literally has a definitional chain that goes from agencies to state agencies to state offices to state legislative offices."

He noted lawmakers can always amend the law, but unless they do they are subject to the state's public records law.

Attorneys for the Legislature had argued that lawmakers exempted most of their records from the state's Public Records Act through a series of changes in past years and therefore were not violating the law passed by voter initiative in 1972.

The media's lawsuit focused on how lawmakers interpreted a 1995 revision to a 1971 definition of legislative records. Legislative lawyers have regularly cited that change as a reason to withhold records.

Separate legislative attorneys hired for this case have further argued that later changes in 2005 and 2007 definitively removed lawmakers from disclosure requirements.

"We are pleased with the court's decision that records of state lawmakers are in fact subject to public disclosure," said AP's Deputy Managing Editor for U.S. News Noreen Gillespie. "Today's ruling is a victory for the public — allowing the people to know what their elected officials are doing behind closed doors."
