Dead crows found in Portland; poisoning suspected

PORTLAND (AP) — The Audubon Society of Portland says at least 10 crows have died in a suspected poisoning.

The group said in a statement Wednesday that witnesses a day earlier saw birds “falling from the sky” in northeast Portland as a large flock traveled west toward downtown. Another dead crow was found near Portland State University.

Portland Audubon says the deaths are consistent with exposure to toxic substances, but testing must be done to confirm it. The birds had appeared to be in otherwise good physical condition.

Thousands of crows swirl through Portland skies on winter afternoons. A cacophony breaks out as the birds settle into trees in and near downtown. Sidewalks are often coated with bird droppings, as are vehicles parked under the wrong branch.

The Audubon Society is offering a $1,000 reward for information that leads to the cause of what happened.

Miles Davis named president of Linfield College

PORTLAND (AP) — Miles Davis is the new president of Linfield College.

The man who shares a name with the jazz great is the first African-American president in the 160-year history of the college based in McMinnville.

Davis has spent the last six years as dean of the school of business at Shenandoah University in Winchester, Virginia. He starts his new job July 1.

In a statement released by the school, Davis said he is excited to join the Linfield community. He said the students he met during a visit stole his heart with their inquisitive and thoughtful questions.

A nationwide search for Linfield’s 20th president began in May, when Thomas Hellie said he would retire at the end of the 2017-18 school year.
