Convicted Oregon burglar challenges fingerprint evidence

By CONRAD WILSON
Oregon Public Broadcasting

PORTLAND — In 2016, a jury convicted Audrey Cannon of burglary after police said she broke into a house in northeast Portland.

Forensic investigators with the Portland Police Bureau linked Cannon to the crime scene based on a fingerprint recovered from a liquor bottle they analyzed.

"She was charged and convicted of that crime based on the fingerprint," said Marc Brown, Oregon's chief deputy public defender for appeals.

According to court documents, the latent fingerprint is the only evidence that connects Cannon to the crime scene.

"It's a problem because we like to have evidence that's reliable," he said.

The Oregon Court of Appeals heard Cannon's appeal Friday in Salem. It's unknown when a ruling will come, but the case could change the way fingerprint evidence is presented in Oregon's courts, or whether it should be allowed at all.

For decades, fingerprints have been used during trial as irrefutable evidence linking a person to a crime. But recently, science has found the way fingerprints are collected and analyzed is subject to error.

Cannon's case is unique because the conviction relies heavily on the fingerprint evidence. It forces Oregon's appeals court to consider the quality of fingerprint evidence and how it's presented in court.

Fingerprint Science

Fingerprints are used all the time to identify people, whether for a background check or a gun permit. Those fingerprints are done in a controlled setting and are widely accepted.

The issue Cannon's case raises involves latent fingerprints — those left unintentionally.

"Think about the dynamics of touch," said Liz Flannery, a supervisor at the Oregon State Police crime lab.

"How does the finger actually contact the surface? Is it during course of movement?" she posed. "If so, there's the potential that you're creating distortion in the fingerprint."

Most latent fingerprints, Flannery said, aren't completely clear.

Brown said the Multnomah County judge who presided over Cannon's trial should not have allowed the jury to hear the fingerprint evidence.

"There's no appellate case that says this is valid science," Brown said. "Most states have an appellate decision from way back when that says these are valid."

By all accounts, scientific evidence is powerful at trial. It's only become more so because of TV crime shows that depict forensic investigators clinching convictions.
