OBITUARIES

Emmett Earl Pryor

Salem
July 12, 1925 - May 11, 2018

Emmett Earl Pryor, age 92, died Friday May 11, 2018, at his home in Salem, Oregon.
Earl was born in Condon, Oregon, July 12, 1925. His mother, Julia Jones Pryor, preceded him in death when he was three years old. He was raised by his father, Emmet Pryor, and his stepmother, Jean Law Pryor.
Earl attended school in Condon, graduating from Condon High in 1943, where he was student body president and senior class president. He enlisted in the United States Navy immediately after graduation. After attending Oklahoma University, he joined the USS Merrimack as engineering officer.
After the war, he returned to Condon and began farming. He believed deeply in public service and advocacy for agriculture and specifically the wheat industry. He once said in a speech that "every man worth his salt should give back to his community and industry at least 10 percent." He was as good as his word.
He had served on the Gilliam County Assessors Advisory Committee, Gilliam County Board of Equalization, Gilliam County Budget Board, Gilliam County School District 25, Budget Advisory Board, Gilliam County Board of Review, Gilliam County School District 25, Track Improvement Association, chairman, Gilliam County Grain Growers (chairman), Mid-Columbia Production Credit Association, Oregon Highway Federation, Oregon State Extension Advisory Board, Oregon Agricultural Research and Extension Project Advisory Board, Committee for Senate Bill 100/LCDC Citizen Advisory Committee, Oregonians for Food and Shelter founding member, Agriculture Political Action League founder member, Oregon Wheat League president, Agriculture Recovery Council founder and chairman, Oregon Wheat Commission chairman, Council for Economic Development in Oregon founder and chairman, Oregon Economic Development Commission, National Association of Wheat Growers president, and U.S. Commission on Agriculture Trade and Export Policy.

Earl was preceded in death by his wife of 30 years, Bernice "Peetie" Petroff of The Dalles. He is survived by his wife, Laura Pryor of Salem; son Marc and Paula Pryor of Torrance, Calif.; son Ty Pryor of Condon; grandchildren Damon Pryor of Damascus, Brittany Pryor Lodge of Boise, Idaho, and Stephanie Moore of Maryland; great-grandchildren Maggie and Grant Pryor of Damascus; and nieces and nephews that he was always very close to: Rod and Jean Pryor of Olympia, Wash., Joyce and Mike Allen of Brewster, Wash., Scott Pryor of Spokane, Wash., Larry and Kay Lear of Condon, David and Marlene Johnson of Bend, and Julie Johnson of Florida.
Memorial contributions may be made to the Condon Scholarship Foundation, P.O. Box 385, Condon, OR 97823.

A celebration of life will be held at the Condon Elks Lodge Saturday, May 19, at noon for family and friends; lunch will be served.

Author Tom Wolfe dead at 88

NEW YORK (AP) — Tom Wolfe, the white-suited wizard of "New Journalism" who exuberantly chronicled American culture from the Merry Pranksters through the space race before turning his satiric wit to such novels as "The Bonfire of the Vanities" and "A Man in Full," has died. He was 88.
Wolfe's literary agent, Lynn Nesbit, told The Associated Press that he died of an infection Monday in a New York City hospital. Further details were not immediately available.
An acolyte of French novelist Emile Zola and other authors of "realistic" fiction, the stylishly-attired Wolfe was an American maverick who insisted that the only way to tell a great story was to go out and report it. Along with Gay Talese, Truman Capote and Nora Ephron, he helped demonstrate that journalism could offer the kinds of literary pleasure found in books.
His hyperbolic, stylized writing work was a gleeful fusillade of exclamation points, italics and improbable words. An ingenious phrase maker, he helped brand such expressions as "radical chic" for rich liberals' fascination with revolutionaries; and the "Me" generation, defining the self-absorbed baby boomers of the 1970s.

"He was an incredible writer," Talese told the AP on Tuesday. "And you couldn't imitate him. When people tried it was a disaster."
Wolfe was both a literary upstart, sneering at the perceived stuffiness of the publishing establishment, and an old-school gentleman who went to the best schools and encouraged other younger writers. When attending luncheons with fellow authors, he would make a point of reading their latest work.
"What I hope people know about him is that he was a sweet and generous man,"

Michael Lewis, known for such books as "Moneyball" and "The Big Short," told the AP in an email Tuesday. "Not just a great writer but a great soul. He didn't just help me to become a writer. He did it with pleasure."
Wolfe scorned the reluctance of American writers to confront social issues and warned that self-absorption and master's programs would kill the novel. "So the doors close and the walls go up!" he wrote in his 1989 literary manifesto, "Stalking the Billion-Footed Beast." He was astonished that no author of his generation had written a sweeping, 19th century style novel about contemporary New York City, and ended up writing one himself, "The Bonfire of the Vanities."

His work broke countless rules but was grounded in old-school journalism, in an obsessive attention to detail that began with his first reporting job.
"Nothing fuels the imagination more than real facts do," Wolfe said in 1999.
Wolfe's interests were vast, but his narratives had a common theme. Whether sending up the New York art world or hanging out with acid heads, Wolfe inevitably presented man as a status-seeking animal, concerned above all about the opinion of one's peers. Wolfe himself dressed for company — his trademark a pale three-piece suit, high shirt collar and a silk tie. And he acknowledged that he cared — very much — about his reputation.
"My contention is that status is on everybody's mind all of the time, whether they're conscious of it or not," Wolfe said.
He enjoyed the highest commercial and critical rewards. His literary honors included the American Book Award (now called the National Book Award) for "The Right Stuff."
