Colorado decision likely won't settle same-sex bias case in Oregon

Sweet Cakes owners fined, but ask state high court for review

By PARIS ACHEN
Capital Bureau

A U.S. Supreme Court ruling Monday in favor of a Colorado baker who refused to sell a custom wedding cake to a gay couple because of his religious beliefs is unlikely to resolve a similar case that has been appealed to the Oregon Supreme Court.

The opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy determined that members of the Colorado Civil Rights Commission showed anti-religious bias toward Colorado baker Jack Phillips, owner of Masterpiece Cakeshop, in its enforcement of anti-discrimination laws.

But the court's decision stopped short of resolving whether merchants who have religious objections to gay marriage can refuse commercial services to same-sex couples.

"Importantly, the Supreme Court today protected the core principles of our nondiscrimination laws, expressly recognizing that states can seek to prevent the harms of discrimination in the marketplace, including against LGBT people," said Diane Goodwin in a joint statement from Basic Rights Oregon and ACLU of Oregon. "The court did not give businesses the broad right to discriminate."

The Supreme Court ruled 7 to 2 in favor of Phillips' argument that Colorado civil rights commissioners made statements that showed anti-religious bias. Phillips declined to sell a custom-made cake to Charlie Craig and Dave Mullins for the couple's commitment ceremony. The Supreme Court opinion departed from Justice Kennedy's history of supporting gay rights, including the court's 2015 ruling legalizing gay marriage nationwide.

At the time that Phillips refused to sell the cake to Craig and Mullins in July 2012, same-sex marriage was not yet legal in Colorado.

The Oregon Court of Appeals in December upheld a $135,000 fine by the Oregon Bureau of Labor and Industries against Melissa and Aaron Klein, owners of Gresham's Sweet Cakes by Melissa, for refusing to sell a wedding cake to lesbian couple Rachel and Laurel Bowman-Cryer in 2013. The Kleins have sought review of their case by the Oregon Supreme Court, which is still under consideration.

The U.S. Supreme Court's June 4 ruling is unlikely to influence the outcome of the Sweet Cakes case because it applied narrowly to the details of the Colorado case, said Paul Thompson, attorney for the Bowman-Cryers.

"I believe the Colorado case was more Justice Kennedy saying that the Colorado Civil Rights Commission was not neutral and was more animus against the baker," Thompson said.

Attorney Adam Gustafson, who, along with national religious law firm First Liberty Institute, represents the Kleins, disagreed with Thompson's analysis.

"The Oregon Bureau of Labor and Industries decision against the Kleins was tainted by the same anti-religious bias that caused the U.S. Supreme Court to rule for Masterpiece Cakeshop on free exercise grounds," Gustafson said.

Gustafson was referencing Facebook posts by Oregon Labor Commissioner Brad Avakian. Court documents show that Avakian posted a link to a KGW article about the case and wrote: "Everyone has a right to their religious beliefs, but that doesn't mean they can disobey laws that are already in place."

Jim Oleske, professor at Lewis & Clark Law School who filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case, said the kind of bias the Kleins are alleging is different from the anti-religious statements by members of the Colorado civil rights commissioners and would have a higher standard of proof.

Video shows police repeatedly punching man in Oregon

Associated Press

SALEM — Civil rights groups in Oregon are calling for an investigation after a video showed police punching a prone man in the head at least 16 times.

The video shows four officers converging on a man standing on a street, then pulling him to the ground, with three officers holding his limbs and one straddling his back. As one officer appears to struggle to force one of the man's arms behind his back, another begins punching him in the head.

Through the punches, the man, identified as 28-year-old Kevin Straw, repeatedly shouts "I am not resisting." The video was shot by Portland, Oregon, TV station KGW.

The American Civil Liberties Union and the state chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations both called for investigations.

The Marion County Sheriff's Office said the arrest happened Monday after Straw repeatedly shouted at officers involved in the search for two missing fishermen in the Detroit area.

Oregon to lead national suit against CenturyLink

SALEM (AP) — Oregon will lead a national class-action lawsuit against internet and TV provider CenturyLink, over allegations including fraudulent accounts and billing.

The designation is the latest development after the 2017 beginning of the lawsuit, which alleged the company pushed employees to secretly add services and charges to customer accounts. When the allegations came to light, CenturyLink stock declined sharply in value.

A federal judge confirmed that the troubled Oregon Public Employees Retirement Fund would be the lead plaintiff in the case. The Oregon treasurer and attorney general announced the development Tuesday, saying the state had suffered $6 million in losses after the stock dive.

Losses from the alleged actions are part of larger challenges facing state pension planners, as increasing pension bills have driven some municipalities into dire budgetary straits.
