

FIRE: Church known for Journey to Bethlehem

said the congregation will hold church services at the Hermiston Junior Academy, the school run by the Seventh-day Adventist church, on Northwest 11th Street.

Carl Robins, a member of the Hermiston Seventh-day Adventist church for the past seven years, was standing in the parking lot and surveying the damage Monday morning.

“I’m sad,” he said. “I’d be lying if I said I wasn’t.”

Robins said he had looked at the damage inside the building on Sunday, and said it appeared that much of the building’s interior had been burned.

“The guy who does the sound equipment went into the sanctuary, and he said pretty much everything in there is toast,” he said.

Robins said he was relieved no one was injured, which was the most important thing. As he was standing there, a man drove up and handed him a bag.

“I brought cookies for your congregation,” he said. “I know that’s not much.”

Hanson said the church currently has about 175 active members, and they had varying responses to the fire.

“It’s interesting,” he said. “People react in different ways. There certainly were a few people crying — I think especially those who grew up with this being the only church they’ve ever known.”

He said for others, the fire was disappointing, but they were comforted by the knowledge that their church family still exists, just in a different location.

The church, at 855 W. Highland Ave., is best known in the community for its annual Journey to Bethlehem living nativity. Robins said most of the scenery is stored in a separate storage shed.

UCFD was assisted by Boardman, Echo and Umatilla rural fire departments in fighting the fire.

HAMLEY: Pearce said he planned to bid on business

“The Chapter 11 is the separation of our partnership,” Woodfield said. “That’s all it is.”

Woodfield said he planned on going to the auction and bidding but chose bankruptcy protection when he realized the auction was a “rigged sale,” although a legal one.

Pearce found HIPO to buy the debt, Woodfield claims, and its attorney was in charge of the auction. HIPO on the notice of sale — which ran in the East Oregonian — reserved the right to cancel the sale at any time and even refuse the highest bid. HIPO also gave no guarantees about what it was selling.

Blair Woodfield, co-owner of the Hamley properties, filed bankruptcy Friday to stop the auction of the company planned for Monday.

actually amazed at a lot of things about it.”

Such as Woodfield’s credit card debt exceeding $60,000. Pearce said that is indicative of Woodfield’s “bad financial judgment.” Woodfield said he was current on every one of those bills.

Pearce also said the Hamley company agreements state a personal bankruptcy removes a partner’s membership, so Woodfield loses his voting and management rights. Pearce was hopeful the delay would last no more than a month or two.

The civil case over all things Hamley goes to trial July 23-26. Umatilla County Circuit Judge Lynn Hampton last week ruled against Woodfield’s request for an independent receiver to control the businesses. Hampton in a three-page opinion found the receiver “would impose considerable further financial burden and expenses upon the businesses” at a cost of “$300 per hour for the work of the principals and $125 per hour for their associates,” plus professional fees. She also stated a receiver would not prevent compared to June 2017 and a 220-student fall from five years ago.

SCHOOL: Have lost 220 students in 5 years, mostly to relocation

While the district continues to collect more data that shows Pendleton’s youth population is falling, the solutions are largely out of their hands. Matt Yoshioka, the district’s director of curriculum, instruction and assessment, said the top three reasons families give for leaving the district are a lack of housing, a lack of living-wage jobs, or a desire to be closer to family.

Besides supporting the city’s initiatives on developing more housing and job creation, addressing these issues are outside the district’s scope.

Yoshioka said the district is trying to zero in on the second largest contributor to declining enrollment — students that are automatically dropped from the district after missing 10 straight days of school for any reason.

While only 4 percent of K-5 students were dropped due to lack of attendance, 35 percent of students in grades 6-12 left school for that reason.

Yoshioka said he spoke with middle school and high school counselors about the data. The counselors had no trouble identifying those 52 students.

“Every one of those students had a story,” he said.

Many of these students stop attending school because of problems in their home lives, requiring the district to try and direct mental health resources and social services toward the student.

While students often reappear after the district sends out a notice of a 10-day drop, some students re-enroll three to six times per year.

Yoshioka said the district is now identifying those types of children as “students of concern.” Staff hold meetings on these students twice a month to make sure they’re staying on track.

Although the data didn’t deliver positive news for Pendleton’s falling enrollment concerns, Yoshioka said the district will continue to track the data, using 2017-2018 a baseline in the years to come.
