Proposed U.S. banking fix for marijuana may not open all doors

By MICHAEL R. BLOOD
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A proposal in Congress to ease the U.S. ban on marijuana could encourage more banks to do business with cannabis companies, but it appears to fall short of a cure-all for an industry that must operate mainly as a cash business in a credit card world.

The proprietor of a medical marijuana dispensary prepares his monthly tax payment, over $40,000 in cash, at his Los Angeles store.

Marijuana is legal in some form in about 30 states, but companies that grow or sell it often are locked out at banks. Their money isn't wanted because the drug is illegal under federal law and transactions tied to pot proceeds could expose financial institutions to money-laundering charges.

The bipartisan measure — which received tentative support from President Donald Trump — would ensure states have the right to determine the best approach to marijuana, without federal interference. It also includes language intended to address the banking gap caused by the federal ban.

The legislation has been praised as a strong step, but "standing alone, it's likely not a silver bullet for the banking problem," said California pot industry attorney Nicole Howell Neubert, a member of a state task force that studied the banking stalemate.

"Most financial institutions will be looking for even more affirmative direction from (Washington) to feel comfortable with banking cannabis companies," she said in a statement.

The shortage of banking services has been a major obstacle to the industry, often forcing businesses to conduct sales and pay vendors and taxes in cash, sometimes in vast amounts that can become targets for criminals.

The number of financial institutions working with marijuana companies has been growing, but it's still a small fraction overall.

The Mountain West Credit Union Association and the Maine Credit Union League said in a joint statement that the legislation would "provide the certainty we need ... to service this growing industry."

The measure, which faces an uncertain future in Congress, does not legalize marijuana nationally. But it takes steps to allow banks to handle marijuana funds without the risk of federal prosecution.

For example, it says money from marijuana businesses in states where the drug is legal would no longer be considered illegal proceeds, and it would allow banks to accept those funds without breaking money-laundering laws.

Even then, risk remains as banks face a range of compliance rules by accepting marijuana-linked money. The Bank Secrecy Act requires that banks know their customers well enough to ensure they are not engaging in money laundering, said Julie A. Hill, a professor at the University of Alabama School of Law.

Redmond woman dies from hantavirus pulmonary syndrome

REDMOND (AP) — An Oregon woman has died from hantavirus pulmonary syndrome, a disease transmitted through rodent droppings, health officials said.

Lindy Farr, of Redmond, died Wednesday, the Deschutes County Health Department officials confirmed.

The 67-year-old Farr was admitted June 7 to the ICU at St. Charles Redmond after she was experiencing trouble staying awake. She was placed on a ventilator Saturday, then airlifted to Oregon Health & Sciences University in Portland on Sunday, where she died, The Bend Bulletin reported.

"She was in good health," said Farr's neighbor and friend, Sheila Hart. "You would have never in a million years thought she would have been gone in a week."

About 35 percent of those infected will die from the disease, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Hantavirus exposure usually occurs after breathing in the virus when rodent urine and droppings are stirred up into the air, according to health officials. People also can become infected when they touch mouse or rat urine, droppings, or nesting materials that contain the virus, and then touch their eyes, nose, or mouth. The disease is not spread from person to person.

"A lot of times it will happen after an area has been closed up for a while, a summer home or a barn, something like that," Heather Kaisner said, a spokeswoman for the health department. They go in and they do spring cleaning, and there are mice droppings everywhere."

Farr and her husband lived in Redmond but also maintained a home in Culver. Farr had traveled there before Memorial Day, Hunt said.

The case is the 23rd hantavirus infection in Oregon since 1993.

Brown, Buehler lose IPO nomination to Starnes

By PARIS ACHEN
Capital Bureau

Despite robust write-in campaigns, Gov. Kate Brown and Rep. Knute Buehler have failed to cinch the Independent Party of Oregon nomination for governor.

The nomination went to Brownsville cabinetmaker Patrick Starnes, the only candidate listed as an IPO gubernatorial candidate in the voters' pamphlet.

Starnes said his primary victory was a rebellion against big money in politics.

"They spent a lot of money trying to get write-ins," Starnes said. "I would get robo-texts from Brown's campaign, and Buehler had done ads encouraging people to write him in."

"A lot of people are not engaged because they don't think their voices are heard."

Starnes, a party member, took 26 percent of the IPO vote in the party's primary. Buehler, the GOP nominee for governor, came in second with about 25 percent, while Brown secured just 12.5 percent.

"The number of write-ins that Brown and Buehler attempted to get to win cross nomination shows that they saw the importance of it, and the fact that Buehler was as close as he was is quite an achievement," said Rob Harris, a co-chairperson of the IPO council.

"Even though Starnes won the nomination, the tallies between Brown and Buehler indicate that Brown has a lot of work to do with I voters."

While the IPO makes up less than 5 percent of Oregon voters, some, including Harris, believe the party's voting behavior serves as a bellwether of the state's second-largest voting bloc — those who are registered with no political party. The group, also referred to as nonaffiliated or independents with a lowercase "i," consist of more than 836,000 electors and rank second in number only to Democrats.
