Oregon toddler dies after being left in hot car by nurse practitioner mother

By STEVEN DUBOIS
Associated Press

PORTLAND (AP) — A toddler in Oregon died after being left alone in a hot car while her mother went to work as a family nurse practitioner, authorities said Friday.

Nicole Engler, 38, of Roseburg told investigators she thought she had taken her 21-month-old daughter Remington to daycare before heading to work, court documents say.

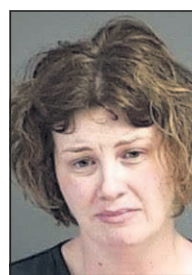

Instead, she completed her shift at 4 p.m. and found the toddler in the back seat — unconscious and blue, authorities said.

Engler rushed the toddler back into the medical facility, where staff performed CPR until an ambulance arrived. The child was pronounced dead Thursday at Mercy Medical Center in Roseburg.

The temperature was about 80 degrees when the child was discovered.

On a day that warm, the temperature inside a vehicle can rise to 109 degrees within 20 minutes, according to a National Safety Council report released earlier this month.

Engler was booked into Douglas County Jail on suspicion of second-degree manslaughter. Court records do not list an attorney to speak on her behalf.

Police Sgt. Gary Klopfenstein said the department had no comment beyond what was in public documents.

Pediatric vehicular heatstroke killed 742 children between 1998 and 2017, the safety council found. The average age of victims was 21 months.

In 54 percent of the cases, the parent or caregiver unknowingly left the youngster in a vehicle. It generally happened when the caregiver was especially tired or there was a change in routine, the authors of the report said.

In a 2014 case near Portland, prosecutors decided not to file criminal charges against an engineer whose daughter died after he forgot she was in the back seat when he arrived at work. They determined it was a "tragic and unintentional accident."

Wildfire season starts with 2 blazes in Central Oregon

Oregon students allowed neither male nor female gender option

MAUPIN (AP) — Wildfire season in Oregon is underway after a lightning storm sparked at least two major fires that are now burning in the central part of the state.

Jean Nelson-Dean, a fire spokeswoman, said Friday the smaller fire burning near Culver triggered the mandatory evacuation of about 100 homes.

That blaze is at about 3 square miles and has not torched any homes.

Another fire near Maupin grew to more than 15 square miles.

There were no mandatory evacuations but residents east of the town are being told to be ready to go if needed.

The fires were started by lightning strikes from strong thunderstorms that swept the region Wednesday.

They are growing quickly in windy and dry conditions.

PORTLAND (AP) — Oregon students will be able to select a non-binary gender option starting next school year.

The Oregonian/OregonLive reports the Oregon Department of Education will allow students who don't identify as male or female to select a third option, "X."

Oregon became the first state last year to allow residents to mark their gender as "not specified" when they apply for a driver's license, learner's permit or identity card.

The action came about after an Oregon court allowed a Portland resident to legally change to non-binary gender in 2016.

The department has previously issued guidance on gender identity by advising schools in 2016 that the individual student is the "person best situated to determine a student's gender identity."

Oregon officials criticized for pesticides killing ponderosa pines

BEND (AP) — Environmental advocates are calling out the Oregon Department of Transportation and its contractors for applying a weedkiller along a highway in Sisters that unintentionally killed hundreds of ponderosa pine trees.

Environmentalists argued that the various groups involved in the project didn't abide by instructions on the chosen herbicide from the Environmental Protection Agency, The Bulletin reported Thursday.

In 2012, the Forest Service and Jefferson County Public Works chose to use the weedkiller Perspective to kill flammable roadside plants on a stretch of highway in Sisters, Ian Reid said, the Sisters district ranger for the Deschutes National Forest.

At the time, the EPA's instructions on the product did not specify it could damage nearby ponderosa pines, Reid said.

"Had a private company done that, every entity in the country would have been on their doorstep," Dan Harshbarger said, a La Pine resident who lost trees on his property in a similar incident.

The label was amended in 2013, when the project was slated to begin, and listed ponderosa pines as a plant species particularly sensitive to the weedkiller.

Representatives from the transportation department and the Forest Service have said that the agencies didn't violate instructions on the label, but acknowledged that there had been a serious mistake.

"We just collectively dropped the ball on that, and it's unfortunate," Reid said.

The Forest Service noticed the tree damage in the area in 2014, but it was not immediately linked to Perspective.

Lisa Arkin, executive director for Beyond Toxics, which focuses on environmental and human health issues across Oregon, said Jefferson Public Works — which was chosen to apply the herbicide — was required by law to check the label.

Central Oregon Landwatch, a Bend-based environmental watchdog group, asked the Forest Service in a letter to consider removing just the tops of trees to keep them from impacting the highway if they fall.

The approach would retain habitats for birds and other animals, Rory Isbell said, staff attorney for Central Oregon Landwatch.
