Occupiers ordered to leave ICE property in Portland

By STEVEN DUBOIS
Associated Press

PORTLAND (AP) — Federal officials Monday ordered protesters to end their round-the-clock occupation of property outside the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement office in Portland.

A man, who would not identify himself, holds a sign at a protest camp on property outside the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement office in Portland.

Law enforcement officers began distributing notices to vacate late Monday morning. The several hundred protesters have so far ignored the demand.

"We acknowledge the community's concerns driving these demonstrations. While demonstrators have a lawful right to assemble and voice their concerns, blocking the building's driveways or entrances is not permitted under federal law," U.S. Attorney for Oregon Billy Williams said in a statement.

The group rallying under the moniker Occupy ICE PDX wants to abolish ICE and end the Trump administration's "zero tolerance" policy in which all unlawful border crossings are referred for prosecution.

Earlier Monday, federal law enforcement officers entered the Portland's ICE headquarters to secure government property ahead of the vacate notice.

The action taken at 3:30 a.m., when many protesters were in their tents, was a precautionary move to protect information and equipment, said Rob Sperling, spokesman for Federal Protective Service, which is responsible for protecting federal buildings.

The protesters did not try to thwart officers. "This morning's entry was peaceful and smooth," Sperling said.

Portland's ICE headquarters has been the site of an occupation since June 17. The occupation grew in size early last week, and the building has been closed since Wednesday. There's no indication that protesters have gone inside the facility, Sperling said.

Portland Mayor Ted Wheeler has said police in this sanctuary city won't help federal officers evict any protesters.

Carissa Cutrell, an ICE spokeswoman, said last week that people who had appointments scheduled at the office will be contacted by deportation officers to have their meetings rescheduled. The appointments will not be reported as missed check-ins.

Cutrell declined to say how many people work at the Portland office, or if they have been working from home since it was closed because of security concerns.

Judge grants lawyers access to immigrants detained at federal prison in Sheridan

By STEVEN DUBOIS
Associated Press

PORTLAND (AP) — A federal judge said Monday that immigration attorneys must be given access to more than 120 asylum seekers detained at an Oregon prison.

U.S. District Judge Michael Simon in Portland granted an emergency restraining order sought by the American Civil Liberties Union and the Innovation Law Lab, a nonprofit whose attorneys have been denied access to immigrants being held at the federal prison in Sheridan.

Simon wrote that the right to counsel is firmly entrenched in the concept of due process and protected by the Fifth Amendment against governmental interference: "Further, this right is available to everyone in the United States, not just citizens or others who are here lawfully."

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement transferred the immigrants to Oregon because other holding facilities have been overloaded since the Trump administration enacted a "zero tolerance" policy involving people entering the country illegally.

The Sheridan detainees are from 16 countries, but more than half are from India and Nepal.

Defendants named in the lawsuit are Department of Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen; Thomas Homan, acting director of ICE; U.S. Attorney General Jeff Sessions; and Hugh Hurwitz, acting director of the federal Bureau of Prisons, among others.

The judge said the defendants must provide at least two rooms for detainees to meet with lawyers. Those rooms will be available six hours a day for individual consultation or group "know your rights" training.

The defendants argued they were already planning that step, so the lawsuit is moot. Simon, however, noted that the defendants expected to make the rooms available starting Wednesday, one day before ICE officials want to start interviews to assess whether a detainee faces a credible degree of fear if deported.

"This is insufficient time to provide attorney access that satisfies the requirements of due process," Simon wrote.

In his order, the judge said ICE officials can't proceed with an asylum interview or hearing until after the detainee has meaningfully consulted with an attorney. Moreover, the detainees can't be transferred from Oregon to an out-of-state facility without the consent of counsel or permission of the court.

Sides debate over Eugene's backyards, accessory dwellings

EUGENE (AP) — A new law that takes effect July 1 has sparked debate in Eugene over smaller dwellings on existing home lots.

The law will require most Oregon cities and counties to allow at least one dwelling unit for each detached home in areas zoned for single-family structures, "subject to reasonable local regulations relating to siting and design," The Register-Guard reported.

The battle over so-called accessory dwelling units pits homeowners against affordable-housing advocates. Affordable-housing advocates view the smaller homes and additions to existing homes as a way to provide lower-cost dwellings in a city that is struggling with fast-rising rents and home prices.

Eugene city planners also like the idea of putting additional dwellings on existing lots as a way to provide more housing within the city's existing boundaries.

But neighborhood associations worry about the effects of squeezing more homes in established neighborhoods. There are concerns that fitting more homes into neighborhoods would result in a loss of privacy and increased problems with traffic and parking.

Eugene city councilors agreed in January to a proposal by city planners to split the requirements under the law into two phases, with phase one centered on the areas of town where the additional structures could be built. The second phase would focus on the siting of the structures on residential lots and their design regulations.

It's unknown when the phase two work will begin. The work will be wrapped into a broader project the city is undertaking to examine ways to make housing more affordable in Eugene.

The debate is sure to get more raucous as city leaders review and consider changes to the regulations surrounding accessory dwellings — even as their recent decisions are being challenged.
