Nine detained, officers reopen immigration office in Oregon

By STEVEN DUBOIS
Associated Press

PORTLAND — Authorities detained nine people Thursday while trying to reopen a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement building in Portland, Oregon, that had been closed because of a round-the-clock demonstration.

Officers moved in at sunrise and were able to unblock the entrance to the facility that had been closed for more than a week, said Rob Sperling, spokesman for Federal Protective Service, which is responsible for protecting federal buildings.

Sperling said the goal was not to end the protest, but to make the building accessible to employees who are likely to return to work next week. Officers were holding a boundary line between federal and private property, and they would maintain a round-the-clock security presence "for some time," he said.

Seven protesters who were blocking entrances were charged with misdemeanors for failing to comply with directions given by law enforcement officers, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Oregon. They were released from custody with orders to appear in court Sept. 7.

Another protester faces a state charge of interfering with a peace office, while one other was released without charges.

Ben Dorfman, a protester who has been sleeping at the camp, told Oregon Public Broadcasting he was awakened at 5:30 a.m. by someone alerting him of law enforcement activity.

"I think their priority right now is to get us off the ICE property so that the ICE building can continue to function, get people going in and out," Dorfman said. "I don't think they're going to try and tear this whole thing down."

The activists rallying under the moniker Occupy ICE PDX — PDX is Portland's airport code — want to abolish ICE and end the Trump administration's zero-tolerance immigration policy.

The occupation began June 17. It quickly grew in size, and the building was closed for safety reasons three days later. Officers entered the building Monday to secure equipment and information and warned protesters to stop blocking entrances or risk arrest.

U.S. Attorney for Oregon Billy Williams said his office is committed to protecting freedom of speech and peaceful assembly: "However, when individuals break the law by blocking employees and the public from accessing a federal facility, federal law enforcement will respond to restore normal business operations."

ANALYSIS Majority of Portland arrests in 2017 were homeless people

PORTLAND (AP) — One in every two arrests made by the Portland Police Bureau last year was of a homeless person, a recent analysis found.

Homeless people accounted for 52 percent of arrests in 2017, The Oregonian/OregonLive reported.

A federal survey last year found 4,177 people living outside, in shelters or transitional housing in Multnomah County.

The newspaper's analysis found that 4,437 homeless people — 260 more than the survey counted — were arrested by Portland police last year.

The analysis found that 84 percent of the arrests were for non-violent crimes, and more than 1,200 arrests were solely for offenses that are typically procedural — missing court or violating probation or parole.

In the first three months of 2018, the disparity continued to grow. The percentage of arrests of homeless people outpaced last year's. Police Chief Danielle Outlaw and Mayor Ted Wheeler, who serves as police commissioner, have both said being homeless is not a crime.

Wheeler declined repeated interview requests for The Oregonian/OregonLive's story. His chief of staff, Michael Cox, would not say whether the newspaper's findings were concerning or surprising.

"From the mayor's perspective, the question really is how can we help folks who are vulnerable before they — before it comes down to criminal activity," Cox said.

He said the arrests of homeless people are "a sign that we, as a society, have already dropped the ball, perhaps a couple times, before that police interaction."

Eighty percent of the homeless people arrested last year had been arrested at least once in the past two decades.
