Candidates make case to publishers

By CLAIRE WITHYCOMBE
Capital Bureau

POWELL BUTTE — The Republican and Independent Party nominees for governor made their respective cases for a change of state leadership before an audience of newspaper editors and publishers Friday.

GOP nominee Knute Buehler, a state representative and orthopedic surgeon from Bend, and Independent Party of Oregon nominee Patrick Starnes, a cabinet maker from Brownsville, spoke briefly at the annual convention of the Oregon Newspaper Publishers Association.

I n c u m b e n t Gov. Kate Brown, the Democratic nominee, did not attend.

Brown initially declined the invitation because she planned to go to a National Governors' Association conference in Santa Fe, N.M. But, Brown instead stayed in Oregon to oversee emergency response to major wildfires, according to a spokesman for her campaign.

At Friday's forum, each candidate was permitted about 10 minutes to outline their platform, followed by roughly five minutes of questions from attendees.

Buehler outlined four priorities: improving the state's public education system, making major reforms to foster care and Medicaid, reducing homelessness and supporting the state's rural communities and businesses.

He aims to increase the state's high school graduation rate, institute reforms to the struggling foster care system and lift up Oregon's food, wood products and renewable energy industries.

He portrayed himself as an independent alternative to Brown, under whose leadership, he argued, the problems in these policy areas have worsened. Brown has been at the helm since early 2015, when Gov. John Kitzhaber resigned in the wake of an influence-peddling scandal.

"In order to solve these big problems... we're going to need leadership from a governor, leadership that is a lot more independent and less partisan," Buehler said. "Leadership that is actually more interested in innovative ideas than a particular ideology."

In response to questions about state public records issues, Buehler said that as a legislator, after the Kitzhaber scandal, he'd sponsored — and the Legislature passed — stronger whistleblower protections for Oregon's public employees.

Starnes, meanwhile, principally stumped for his main cause: campaign finance reform.

He wants to put limits on campaign contributions (The Oregon Constitution currently prohibits limits on campaign contributions and expenditures for state elections).

"I would argue that this big money in politics is what's corrupting and stalemating our system," Starnes said. "It's a systemic problem."

Starnes says, if elected, he would refuse to sign other legislation until campaign finance reform was signed into law. He claims that a lack of campaign finance regulations has played a part in allowing public employee health care and pension costs to climb because the government is beholden to special

East Oregonian wins General Excellence, three other first place awards

East Oregonian

The East Oregonian took home four first place honors including the top prize — General Excellence — at the Oregon Newspaper Publishers Association conference Friday in Bend.

The EO has won the top prize in the competition in seven of the past eight years. Its division is for daily Oregon newspapers with circulations less than 10,000. Photojournalist E.J. Harris earned two individual top honors for work done in 2017, including for best feature photo and best sports photo. And former intern Emily Olson won the top spot for best sports story for her piece about cowboy names.

The newspaper also won numerous second and third place awards.

The general election is Nov. 6, 2018.

Christian Gaston, a spokesman for the Brown campaign, in an email dismissed Buehler's assertions, and said the governor had been working on many of the priorities Buehler outlined Friday.

Gaston also said Brown supported campaign finance reform in the 2015 legislative session, and that she "will continue to push to make sure everyone's voice is heard."

U.S. may pick Western headquarters for BLM in months

DENVER (AP) — The Trump administration says it may pick a new Western headquarters for the nation's largest land management agency in the next six to eight months.

Susan Combs, a senior adviser to Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke, told a Senate committee Thursday that Zinke is committed to moving the Bureau of Land Management headquarters from Washington to the West. The bureau is part of Zinke's department.

Combs offered no hints about where the new headquarters will be.

The bureau manages nearly 388,000 square miles nationwide, and 99 percent is in 12 Western states.

Many Western leaders say the bureau's headquarters should be closer to the land it manages. Zinke, a former Montana congressman, agrees.

Some bureau veterans question the plan, saying the agency needs a presence in Washington.

Washington deputy fired because of Proud Boys apparel

VANCOUVER, Wash. (AP) — The Clark County Sheriff's Office has fired a deputy who was photographed wearing apparel affiliated with the Proud Boys, a far-right group known for white nationalist rhetoric.

The Columbian newspaper reports Deputy Erin Willey was let go Tuesday after an internal investigation that began when the office was shown a photograph of her wearing a hooded sweatshirt with a logo that includes a switchblade, lipstick and an abbreviation for Proud Boys' Girls.

Willey is also shown in a second photograph shared on a Proud Boys-affiliated Twitter page, which included her contact information for buying Proud Boys' Girls merchandise.

Willey did not return the newspaper's request for comment.

Undersheriff Mike Cooke declined to discuss the investigation, saying it's a personnel issue.
