Exploring Your City

It's human nature: we rarely explore what's in our own backyards. A staycation is the perfect chance to be a tourist in your own city or region — with the benefit of going home, cooking dinner in your own kitchen and sleeping in your own bed. Forbes offered a number of ideas to check out in your city.

GO TO THE LOCAL MUSEUM

Most cities and towns have museums of some kind that catalog the history of the city or some industry or happening in the city, the science around some interesting physical aspect of the region, the life of a local celebrity or even some quirky feature about the city, such as the UFO Museum in Roswell, New Mexico, which sprang up from the interest surrounding the reported alien landing in 1947. You can also look up the buildings in your city that are on the National Register of Historic Places and do a little architectural tour around town.

SEE A SHOW

Whether it's community theater or a professional performance, see what live performances are happening in your community. If you have several options, try something you may not normally go to. Check out an opera or a ballet or a big band performance. During the summer, cities often host concerts in the park, which is a great way to hear live music with the whole family.

CHEER ON YOUR LOCAL SPORTS TEAM

Have a minor league sports team in the area? Get tickets and go see them play. Minor league baseball games are a great time to throw out a blanket, spend time with your friends or children, eat stadium food and watch the action. You might have other sporting events going on in your area too, even though high school sports aren't going on during the summer.

FESTIVALS, PARADES AND OTHER SPECIAL EVENTS

A lot of cities have a Fourth of July parade or fireworks or a festival celebrating the city's founding; festivals in particular are often weekend-long affairs with food, vendors, games and other fun ways to wile away a day or two. Farmers markets let you buy local produce, shop from artisans' creations and enjoy live music. County and state fairs also offer a great opportunity to eat food you'd never eat when you're not on vacation and see events like rodeos, demolition derbies and concerts.
