What's new at Farm-City

Rodeo-goers can anticipate a new and improved environment at Farm-City this year.

Members of the board, along with dozens of volunteers, have put in hours of work to make this year's rodeo experience the best yet. Among the most notable of changes is the installment of a brand new second scoreboard in the arena. In previous years the arena's sole scoreboard might have been obscured to some viewers in certain seating arrangements. This year, everyone will have a good view of the action.

"This year, every seat is a good seat," said Jon Gill, a member of the Farm City board of directors.

Additionally, more livestock pens were installed on the rodeo grounds to accommodate more contestants, as well as a rod iron fence surrounding the Chute 8 Whiskey grounds to give it a more stylish and secure appeal.

And within that fence is an all-new tap system for dispensing beverages. This year, drinks are stored in a cooler out back, then run underground through a glycol cooling system, maintaining a steady temperature of roughly 34 degrees, and finally, they come out straight through the tap and are served to customers.

"The fans are the most important here," Gill said. "We want them to get what they paid for, and provide them with the best experience possible."
