Time After Time

One of today's most popular pieces of fashion — and utility — didn't become popular until World War I: the wrist watch. Clocks were around long before then, and pocket watches had already made their appearance in the 15th century, but clocks worn around the wrist became popular out of necessity.

Now the wristwatch is just as much for fashion as it is for telling time. So, what's in a watch?

ANALOG WATCH

This is what most people think of when they picture a wristwatch. The clock face has 12 hours with two hands — one indicating the hour and one indicating minutes. These watches can be found with either traditional or Roman numerals.

DIGITAL WATCH

The hours, minutes and seconds are indicated by digits rather than by hands on a dial. Digital watches are getting less press with the coming of the smart watch.

SMART WATCH

The digital watch of the modern age. These wristwatches not only tell time, but have touch screens, support apps and often offer other features like heart rate and steps taken.

CHRONOGRAPH WATCH

This is just a fancy word for stopwatch. There is a start/stop button normally located on the side to measure time. This feature is easily spotted in a wrist watch by the addition of a ring of numbers on the outer rim of the watch.

DIVING WATCH

These watches are designed to be under water at great resistance, typically up to 330 feet.

QUARTZ WATCH

This is the most precise of watches.

The watch is powered by an electronic oscillator synchronized by quartz crystal. This technology was introduced in 1969.

MECHANICAL WATCH

The predecessor to quartz watches, mechanical watches use a mechanism to measure the passage of time. This produces the iconic ticking noise but is also known for either gaining or losing a few seconds over a period of time.
