

B2H: ‘It’s all about the money’

will be available to respond to residents’ questions and concerns after the meetings end in Pendleton, Boardman, La Grande, Baker City, and Ontario.

Critics like JoAnn Marlette of Baker City contend that the transmission line would alter Eastern Oregon’s scenery, create negative effects on the environment, and create noise issues for local residents.

In an interview Thursday, Marlette said she has suggested Idaho Power instead bury the power lines or invest in microgrids — a small, local grid that has the ability to operate independent from the larger power grids — but her arguments haven’t halted the project.

Jeff Maffuccio, the facility siting coordinator for Idaho Power, conceded that Boardman to Hemingway would likely change some of the views in Eastern Oregon, but it’s taking steps during the planning process to make the transmission towers less intrusive.

Maffuccio said none of the towers would have fencing around them and the service roads would be dirt rather than paved streets.

Boardman to Hemingway’s application is thousands of pages long, and although Maffuccio said he’s confident that Idaho Power has addressed any concerns up to this point, he wants to wait to receive more public input before he’s assured that the transmission will clear the regulatory process.

While the line has alternative routes, the general path of the line is the same.

From the Oregon-Idaho border, the line snakes between Vale and Harper before charting a similar path to Interstate 84.

The line bypasses Huntington, Baker City, and La Grande, splitting from I-84 around Meacham.

Boardman to Hemingway crosses Highway 395 south of Pilot Rock before taking a hard turn north toward Boardman after crossing Highway 207 in Morrow County.

Maffuccio said Idaho Power has altered the route based on local concerns, like moving the transmission line south after realizing how many people lived in McKay Creek area north of Pilot Rock.

“We didn’t realize that there’s a lot of houses until we got on the ground,” he said.

Maffuccio said Idaho Power is also working with Morrow County farmers and the Boardman Bombing Range to address any of their concerns.

Boardman to Hemingway won’t go unopposed at the upcoming series of public meetings. Marlette said she plans to attend the meetings in Ontario, Baker City, and La Grande.

The Pendleton meeting will be held at the Pendleton Convention Center on Oct. 18 from 5 p.m. to 8 p.m. The SAGE Center will host the Boardman meeting at the same day and time.

Following the public meetings, the department of energy plans to submit a draft proposed order to Energy Facility Siting Council for either approval or denial in the first quarter of 2019.

Once the order is submitted, the department will hold public hearings in all five counties and begin accepting testimony and public comment on the project.

Idaho Power projects to have final regulatory approval from the state in early 2021 and complete Boardman to Hemingway in 2025.

WOLF: ‘Ranchers need to buy in’ tected species west of highways 395, 78 and 95.

Todd Nash, a Wallowa County commissioner and member of the Oregon Cattlemen’s Association, said the proposal would provide much-needed clarity and directions for ranchers to follow when it comes to dealing with problem wolves.

“There should be no dispute whether you did enough non-lethal,” Nash said.

Sean Stevens, executive director of Oregon Wild, said the concept also holds promise for the environmental community because it prioritizes non-lethal measures ahead of conflict.

“Done well and with a lot of goodwill, this could be effective,” Stevens said. “It really does focus on avoiding conflict.”

It remains unclear how such a program would be paid for in the long term. The group discussed possible funding sources, including the Wolf Depredation Compensation and Financial Assistance Grant Program, which receives money from the Legislature and is administered by the Oregon Department of Agriculture.

During the 2017 legislative session, Rep. Greg Barreto, R-Cove, introduced a bill that would tie compensation directly to the increasing wolf population. That measure could surface again in 2019.

ODFW staff will write specific language for developing site-specific deterrence plans and present it to the work group Nov. 5 during a webinar and conference call. The next in-person meeting is scheduled for Nov. 27 in Pendleton.

Individual group members made it clear they still have lingering concerns over other parts of the Oregon plan. Stevens took issue with the state’s definition of “chronic depredation” in Phase III of the plan, which is currently defined as two attacks on livestock over any period of time.

ODFW has proposed amending the rule to three attacks on livestock in a 12-month period, but Stevens said even that is too broad.

“We really need to be thinking about an appropriate timeline,” Stevens said.

The group also went back and forth on issues, such as radio collars, and whether it is appropriate for local authorities, such as county sheriff’s offices, to participate in wolf-livestock depredation investigations. Those topics will be up for further discussion moving forward.

For the wolf plan to work, Nash said ranchers and rural communities need to buy in. Right now, he said the current plan is broken.

“Producers don’t call in depredations at this point. Most have chosen not (to) work within the context of the plan, because the context of the plan hasn’t worked,” Nash said. “You’ve lost the human tolerance condition among ranchers, in northeast Oregon especially.”

Kevin Blakely, deputy administrator for the ODFW Wildlife Division, said he was encouraged by the progress Tuesday, and believes it could be a foot in the door for more consensus.

“There’s got to be something for everybody on the table,” Blakely said. “I think that’s how you start to get some movement.”

A bill was introduced in 2017 that ties compensation directly to increasing the wolf population
