Cross-Country and Downhill

Whether you're speeding down an icy slope before executing a perfect stop at the bottom, taking on the bunny slopes with careful "S" moves or exploring the terrain on cross-country skis, strapping two pieces of wood to your feet is a great way to spend a winter day. If you've never been, don't be afraid to give skiing a try.

DOWNHILL SKIING
 Downhill skiing provides an adrenaline rush every time you make it down a hill, but if you've never been before, you may spend a lot of time in the snow instead of sliding down. The Adventure Sports Network offered a number of ways to make skiing more fun, such as finding your favorite lift and getting used to it and figuring out what trails you like. Most ski resorts label the ski runs by difficulty; avoid black diamond runs until you are very confident in your ability.
 There are some downsides to downhill skiing, though. It's more expensive; you have to rent skis and boots and buy a lift ticket. You may also want to pay for a lesson or two if you're brand new to the sport; there are tricks to stopping, slowing and controlling your skis in the unwieldy boots.
 Sometimes, even putting on the skis or getting up when you fall down (and rest assured you will fall down) can be tricky, and some expert advice can go a long way.

CROSS-COUNTRY SKIING
 For a more relaxed ski trip that allows you to explore the terrain and take you away from the crowds and into nature, give cross-country skiing a try. It is less expensive to rent skis, and the skis and boots are significantly more comfortable than downhill skis.

 Cross-country skiing also has great health benefits; since you rely on yourself to get both up and down hills, you can burn more than 1,000 calories an hour while getting a full-body workout and get your heart rate up, according to Health Fitness Revolution.
 Cross-country skiing is also a great sport to do by yourself or with others. Go alone, and you have time to think and appreciate nature. Go with others and take advantage of the miles of snow-covered trails to chat.
