Poll: Americans OK with immigration rate

By AMY TAXIN Associated Press

SANTA ANA, Calif. A growing number of Americans say immigration levels should remain the same or increase, according to a major U.S. sura shift that comes as the Trump administration has ramped up immigration enforcement. At the same time, the latest data from the General Social Survey — a widely respected poll that has measured trends on American attitudes since the 1970s shows a growing partisan divide on the topic over the past decade.

The 2018 survey released this week shows 34 percent of Americans want immigration levels to be reduced. down from 41 percent in 2016, according to an analysis by The AP-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research and GSS staff.

That's compared with 23 percent of Americans who want more immigration, up from 17 percent in 2016, and 41 percent who say they want immigration levels to stay the same.

It's the first time since the survey question was first asked in 2004 that more Americans want immigration to remain the same than to be reduced.

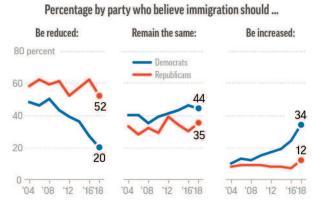

The survey is conducted every two years, and the question was last asked before President Donald Trump took office and made it harder for people to immigrate to the United States.

Trump has repeatedly called for a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border, and his push for wall funding last year drove the federal

Poll: Fewer want immigration reduced

While a growing number of Americans say immigration to the U.S. should be increased or remain the same, the partisan divide over the issue has widened in the last decade, according to a long-running poll of American attitudes.

Percentage who believe the number of immigrants should ... Be reduced — Remain the same — Be increased 2006 2008 2012 government workers. The administration enacted a travel ban for citizens of mostly Muslim countries, including Iran and Yemen, that has torn families apart. And officials last year separated immigrant parents from their children to prosecute illegal border crossers, a move that sparked an international outcry.

"People are more tolerant of immigration than the president and the far right would have us believe," said Louis DeSipio, a political science professor at the University of California, Irvine.

According to the survey, nearly three times as many Democrats as Republicans want more immigrants allowed into the country, while Republicans are more than twice as likely as Democrats to favor less immigration.

But fewer Republicans want a reduction in immigration than did in 2016. In 2018, 52 percent of Republicans said they wanted less immigration, down from 62 percent two years earlier.

And 44 percent of Democrats say they want immigration levels to remain the same, while 34 percent want an increase in immigration. The survey — which does not distinguish between illegal and legal immigration – also looked at Americans' views on the issue by race.

About 41 percent of whites want a decrease in immigration, while 24 percent of blacks and 22 percent of Hispanics say the same.

Trump has made immigration an intensely political issue, and also an issue of race, said Manuel Pastor, director of the University of Southern California's Center for the Study of Immigrant Integration.
