Republican lawmaker

loses in lawsuit over

2018 tax law

Associated Press

PORTLAND — The Oregon Tax Court has sided with Democratic lawmakers on a lawsuit filed last year by a Republican state senator hoping to overturn a controversial tax law.

The Oregonian/OregonLive reports that if Sen. Brian Boquist, R-Dallas, had prevailed, the state could have been left with a quarter-billion dollars less in tax revenue in the current two-year budget of $22.5 billion.

But the court backed the state in a March 21 ruling, finding that the law that denies an additional tax break for certain business owners complies with the Oregon Constitution. Boquist said Thursday that he does not plan to appeal.

Senate Bill 1528 repealed a tax break for people who earn income from certain businesses, such as partnerships and S corporations, and pay taxes on their personal tax returns.

President Donald Trump’s 2017 federal tax law included the same deduction, and Oregon was on track to replicate it because the state automatically copies federal tax code.

Democrats in the Legislature argued that those types of companies, known as pass-through businesses, did not deserve another tax break because they already pay lower income tax rates than wage earners under a 2013 Oregon law.

Although the legislation to prevent the tax break was somewhat convoluted, it was a hot topic in 2018 as Gov. Kate Brown ran for re-election. The governor publicly debated for weeks over whether to sign the bill into law, inviting proponents of keeping or killing the tax break to lobby her.

With two weeks left to use her veto on any bill passed by the Legislature this year, Gov. Kate Brown is still deciding whether to kill a corporate tax plan that would net the state a quarter-billion dollars.

Boquist said in the lawsuit that the bill’s purpose was to raise taxes, which meant it was subject to constitutional requirements to originate in the Oregon House and pass both chambers on a three-fifths supermajority vote.

Migrant child who died in U.S. custody had infection

HOUSTON — An autopsy has found that a 7-year-old girl from Guatemala died of a bacterial infection while detained by the U.S. Border Patrol, in a case that drew worldwide attention to the plight of migrant families detained at the southern U.S. border.

The El Paso County Medical Examiner’s office released a report Friday of its findings in the death of 7-year-old Jakelin Caal Maquin.

Jakelin died Dec. 8, just over a day after she was apprehended by Border Patrol agents with her father after entering the U.S. illegally. Jakelin was one of two children to die in Border Patrol custody in December, raising questions about the agency’s ability to care for families.

The report says traces of streptococcus bacteria were found in Jakelin’s lungs, adrenal gland, liver, and spleen. The autopsy says she faced a “rapidly progressive infection” that led to sepsis and the failure of multiple organs.

The medical examiner did not determine which form of streptococcus bacteria Jake-lin contracted.

“It’s a death that could have been preventable,” said Dr. Colleen Kraft, a past president of the American Academy of Pediatrics who spoke to The Associated Press after reviewing the report.

Kraft said the type of infection Jakelin had would have likely caused initial symptoms that a medical professional would have caught, like an elevated heartbeat or respiratory rate.

“She should have been taken to the hospital right away,” Kraft said, adding that “you had somebody who didn’t know to look for those subtle signs that her little system was shutting down.”

U.S. Customs and Border Protection said shortly after Jakelin’s death that she and her father, Nery Gilberto Caal Cuz, were in a group of 163 migrants who were apprehended at about 9:15 p.m. Dec. 6 in a remote part of New Mexico. The father signed an English-language form stating Jakelin was in good health, CBP said, but it remains unclear whether he understood what the form said.

Jakelin and her father boarded a bus at about 4:30 a.m. Dec. 7 from the Antelope Wells port of entry for the Lordsburg station.
