Trust Your Local RV Experts

If you've ever researched RVs online, you know there are many bells and whistles to consider. You may come away confused at what type of RV actually fits your budget and family's needs.

Put away the laptop and head to your local RV dealer for a real, customized shopping experience. There, you can actually step inside an RV to get a feel for the space and design. This will help you not only realize what you want in your next RV, but what you might not necessarily need as well.

RVs come in all shapes and sizes, so depending on your local experts is the best way to go when trying to make a smart shopping decision.

Read on for questions you should be asking your local dealer.

What type of RV should I be looking for?

If you're new to RVing, you may consider going with the most basic of Class A vehicles. This will help you get your feet wet on the RV lifestyle. Your local sales professional will ask questions to find out how often you'll be driving your RV, where you'll be traveling and how much space you need.

eling and how much space you need.

Be prepared before you walk into a dealer by having a game plan for your new RV. That way you're not thrown off by basic questions.

What brand should I consider?

This is a great question to ask, especially if you're open to considering multiple brands. Your local dealer will have information on all of the different manufacturers, including the ones with the best warranty packages.

Your budget may dictate which brand you ultimately settle on, but it's good to get a gauge from your local dealer on what is available.

What is standard and what add-ons are available?

Before signing on the dotted line, make sure you understand what comes with the RV standard and what you'll have to add on to your bill. If you're happy with the standard options for the price, ask what "perks" your dealer may be able to throw in. You never know unless you ask.

Don't forget to clarify what the warranty includes. What does it cover and for how long are some basic questions to ask around the warranty of your new RV.
