Closed for 17 years, St. Jude's in Franklin opens for prayer

By LEAH
WILLINGHAM
The Concord Monitor

FRANKLIN, N.H. — When Barbara Burns plays the organ at St. Jude's Church in Franklin, she thinks about her mother singing with the church's choir 60 years ago.

"You can almost see your family up here, in the choir, teaching Sunday school," said Burns, 81, sitting near the pulpit on her familiar cushioned seat at the organ during a recent Thursday service.

Burns, who began going to St. Jude's as a child, played the organ at the Episcopal Church faithfully for 46 years before it closed in 2002. She said her family shared a love for the old hymns that were played there.

In the almost 17 years since then, Burns said she hasn't found another faith community where she's felt the same connection. Many of her family members have either died or moved away. She said she stopped going to church regularly.

"I tried to go other places, but they weren't St. Jude's," Burns said, wiping tears from her eyes.

That's why Burns was overjoyed when St. Jude's opened its doors again in May.

"After all these years, it just feels like coming home," she said.

Although the church has not reopened in the official sense, in that there isn't a priest performing the Eucharist, the church has been open for prayer services on Thursdays at noon. Joe Rose, a longtime Episcopalian and retired businessman from Loudon, is filling in as a lay pastoral leader.

Communications Director for the Episcopal Church of New Hampshire David Deziel said he's not sure what the Episcopal Church's presence will look like in Franklin long-term, whether it will evolve to a congregation with a priest or not. He said it was important to Robert Hirschfeld, bishop of the diocese of New Hampshire, to have a spiritual presence back in Franklin.

"There's a fairly large population there — it's an area that is in some economic distress, there are a lot of people who have needs from a socioeconomic point of view but also spiritually," he said. "There are a lot of people in the area looking for more meaning, more purpose and a place where they can go to explore that and to deepen that."

Rose said the response from people who have returned to the church so far has been overwhelming.

"Three of them that were longtime parishioners of this church sat in the pew with tears running down their face," Rose said of his first day in St. Jude's. "They were tears of joy being back in their church. That told me that there was a need here and that God sent me here for a good reason."
