Former archbishop of Havana, dies at 83

By ANDREA RODRIGUEZ AND PETER ORSI
Associated Press

HAVANA — Cardinal Jaime Lucas Ortega y Alamino, a sugar worker's son who oversaw the first papal visit to Cuba, helped lower barriers to believers in the communist country and played a role in mediating improved U.S.-Cuba ties, died Friday at age 83.

His death was announced by his successor, Havana Archbishop Juan de la Caridad García Rodríguez.

Ortega helped open a dialogue between Havana and the U.S. that led the two countries to resume relations in 2014, after presidents Raúl Castro and Barack Obama secretly turned to Pope Francis for help. He served as a messenger for both sides, carrying secret letters and responses that helped thaw relations.

With his flawless French, flowing vestments and dark-rimmed glasses, Ortega cut an elegant figure in Cuban society. Abroad, he was well known among fellow cardinals, especially in the United States, where he befriended several, including Cardinal William Keeler, archbishop of Baltimore.

Born and raised in Cuba, the country's top Roman Catholic leader was mentioned at times as a longshot candidate to succeed Pope John Paul II.

But Ortega's beginnings were modest, and his climb up the ecclesiastical ladder was arduous.
