Beer ‘n’ Brats

Few things go together as well as beer and bratwurst. If you can't make it to Munich, here's how to get your own taste of Oktoberfest right in your own backyard.

SO WHAT IS IT?

A bratwurst isn't just any sausage. It's a German sausage that dates to the early 1300s. It literally means a finely chopped meat sausage, and is usually made from veal, beef or pork. They are most commonly eaten as a snack on a white bread roll with mustard. In bars, it can be served with sauerkraut or potato salad and a rye bread or a pretzel. It's often sold as a street food.

In the U.S., the name is commonly shortened to brats. Wisconsin claims to be home to the beer brat, where bratwurst are simmered in beer with butter and onions before grilling. Madison, Wisconsin, hosts the Brat Fest over the Memorial Day weekend, where you can eat your fill of bratwurst.

MAKING YOUR OWN

So let's fire up the grill and make your own beer and brats. First, make a trip to your local grocer and ask the butcher for some quality bratwurst. You should be able to find a few varieties, or, if you're really lucky, your butcher makes his own.

The next most important ingredient is the beer. Don't skimp here; even though you won't be drinking it, it's still important to get a decent beer. Pale lagers work best. If you're a novice beer drinker, ask the experts at your local liquor store to point you in the right direction.

BEER BRATS

Recipe from Kingsford Charcoal.

6 bratwurst
2-3 cans of beer
Sauerkraut
Sautéed onions and peppers

Start a two-zone fire on your grill, with your coals piled to one side. Place a pan over the coals, pour in the beer, and add the brats. Cook for 10-15 minutes, or until the sausages turn white. Move the pan to the cool side and put the brats over the fire using tongs, not a fork. You don't want to puncture the skin. Rotate the sausages for an even sear. Let them rest before serving.
