ECCENTRICITIES OF GREAT MEN.—An article containing a remarkable expose of the "eccentricities of great men" is being extensively published by the newspaper press. It really contains most important information. For instance, we are told that "Sir Richard Steele would sometimes spend forty guineas on a black peruke;" "Cowper bred rabbits, and made bird cages;" "Dr. Johnson made an especial pet of his cat." Extraordinary eccentricities! PUCK has made a new collection of the eccentricities of great men, which he hopes will be appreciated:—Doctor Johnson, in addition to making a pet of his cat, would often stroke a dog. Gray used always to eat peas with a fork, and had an unconquerable dislike to putting his knife in his mouth. The late Duke of Wellington always insisted upon having his coats made to order, and as he detested ready-made clothing, always paid ready money for his clothes. Sir Walter Scott used constantly, on a muddy day, to stop and give a half penny to a crossing-sweeper. Salvatore Rosa was so fond of a little dog, that he would allow it to lick his hand. Beethoven used to take a cold bath every morning. We borrowed this last remarkable fact from the list already in print. Cowper had a great objection to lending his tooth-brush even to his nearest and dearest friend; he was remarkably nice in his habits, and would always insist upon having salt-spoons and a silver knife for his butter on his dinner table. Shelley was in the habit of whistling softly when in deep thought. The author of the remarkable article to which we refer commences it thus:—"It is a trite saying, that no man is a hero to his valet; and the greatest men that history records have had their little weaknesses, flattering to humanity because proving them mortals and not demi-gods." To prove Charles II. a mortal, and not a demi-god, he relates, that he used to walk in St. James' Park with a troop of spaniels after him and feed the ducks. Wonderful condescension in a king! Our author concludes by saying:—"We might easily extend our list; we might extend it to the present day, and tell how Emperor Norton never cleans his boots; how Doctor Rowell always asks his patients what their political opinions are before he prescribes for them; how Judge Pratt never used a comb for his hair, but arranges it with his fingers; how Jump, the artist, when about to have a tooth drawn, always makes a funny sketch of it first; how Ward, the inventor of the celebrated Ward's shirts, always fits two perfect, one over the other; how Tom Maguire goes into convulsion at the sound of an oath or profane word; we might do this, but we respect the little weaknesses of our neighbors. Puck has his little eccentricities; he would rather put a respectable dog in the streets than walk arm in arm with a thief; he would rather shake hands with a laborer in a grey shirt than speak to a rogue in broad cloth who makes his living by following the profession of quack doctor, black-mailer, etc., and moves in the best society.—Puck.

A TERRIBLE PREDICTION.—Professor Leonidas, an Indianapolis astrologer, after looking at the rings round the sun, makes this horrible prophecy: "I observed by the planets that a dreadful plague will commence in Russia, originating in silks brought over from Egypt, Cairo and Turkey. It will extend across the Baltic sea, desolate Germany, cause immense mortality in England, and then spread to the United States. This dreadful epidemic will spot the people like leopards, and turn the flesh to a purple black. The pestilence will carry off such an amount of mortals that there will not be enough left to bury the dead, or give them christian burial.

The streets of our cities' towns, and villages, will be swarmed with the dead and dying. The groans and yells of horror will fill every breast with consternation. Confusion will abound on all sides. The death knell will cease to toll as the malady rages in fury. The infected will fall and die wherever they take it. The stench of the dead will become so common that the survivors will not heed it."
